Chums vary from worst to above average, pinks average, silvers arriving

By Laurie McNicholas

"The third week of July shows the king run being very weak, the chum run all over the board from the worst counts at escapement projects to above average at others, pink salmon are average and silvers starting to appear in Norton Sound," reports Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game. The Kwiniuk River tower in the Elim subdistrict recorded the worst cumulative king and chum salmon count in 30 years through July 20, his update shows.

Only 2,700 sockeye (red) salmon had escaped past the Pilgrim River weir in the Port Clarence district through July 18, so ADF&G closed the lower Kuzitrin River and Pilgrim River to all net fishing on July 20.

"The average historical midpoint at the weir is July 18, and escapement projections show that the escapement goal at Salmon Lake will not be met at current passage rates," Menard said in a press release July 19. "The escapement goal at Salmon Lake is 4,000 to 8,000 sockeye salmon observed by aerial survey. To have any chance of reaching the escapement goal, all gillnetting and seining must be closed in the Pilgrim River drainage and lower Kuzitrin River."

Menard reported a cumulative count of 3,284 sockeyes past the Pilgrim River weir through July 20, and he projected 6,000 sockeyes for a final count. He said daily sockeye counts at the weir were starting to double compared to daily counts when net fishing was allowed. "The closure to net fishing was two weeks earlier last year, and [the] escapement goal was reached in 2011," he added.

"[The] Norton Sound commercial salmon harvest to date is 185,000 pinks, 42,000 chums, 60 sockeyes, and 400 silvers," Menard said. "The pink salmon harvest is the best since 1998. In Norton Sound, commercial chum salmon fishing is occurring in Norton Bay, Shaktoolik and Unalakleet, and commercial pink salmon fishing is occurring in Golovin and Elim. Kotzebue had an average chum harvest for the second week of commercial fishing."

Menard said Norton Sound crabbers had harvested nearly 190,000 pounds of the 465,450-pound commercial red king crab quota through the morning of July 21. "The 2012 harvest to date has been tracking the same with last year's harvest," he added. "There was a slight dip in catches with the recent windy weather slowing deliveries for a couple of days."

Following are excerpts from Menard's report on salmon fisheries in Norton Sound subdistricts for the third week of July.

Unalakleet and Shaktoolik subdistricts

Sport fishing for king salmon is closed until August 15 in the Unalakleet and Shaktoolik subdistricts. This closure includes catch and release fishing for king salmon. In addition, the use of bait is banned in the Unalakleet River and Shaktoolik River drainages.

Subsistence salmon gillnet fishing is open seven days a week in the Unalakleet and Shaktoolik subdistricts, and mesh size restrictions in marine waters and fresh waters ended on July 23. Beach seining is allowed seven days a week, but any king salmon captured must be immediately released in the water.

The commercial harvest to date in the Unalakleet subdistrict totals 17,399 chums, 53,076 pinks, 32 sockeye and 277 silvers. This season's pink harvest is the largest since 1998.

In the Shaktoolik subdistrict, the commercial harvest totals 16,186 chums, 19,345 pinks, 24 sockeyes and 119 silvers. The chum harvest ranks third best in 20 years, and the pink harvest is the best since 2000.

Norton Bay subdistrict:

The gillnet mesh size is restricted to 6 inches or less, and net length is restricted to 100 fathoms or less. The commercial harvest to date is 4,062 chums, 48,122 pinks and 19 silvers. The pink harvest is a record.

Elim subdistrict:

The commercial harvest to date is 1,762 chums, 42,619 pinks and 2 silvers. The pink harvest is the best since 2000.

Golovin subdistrict:

Gillnets are restricted 100 fathoms or less with a mesh size of 4 ½ inches or less. The commercial harvest to date is 2,372 chums and 22,776 pinks. The pink harvest is the best since 1998.

Nome subdistrict:

The subsistence set gillnet schedule is in effect. Pink salmon catch limits have been waived. The schedule is from 6 p.m. Wednesday until 6 p.m. Saturday in the marine waters. The fresh water subsistence area schedule is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday.

Salmon escapement proj-

Menard provided the following cumulative counts at Norton Sound and Port Clarence salmon escapement projects through July 20.

Unalakleet River test fish–26 kings, 727 chums, and 376 pinks. The king catch ranks fourth lowest. The chum catch ranks 10th highest out of 28 years. The pink catch ranks second lowest in the 2000s for an even-numbered year.

North River tower–606 kings, 2,771 chums, 101,504 pinks and 84 silvers. The king count ranks second lowest. Late run timing projections show a final count of 804 kings, which would be 33% below the goal of 1,200 kings. However, in 2010 for this date the cumulative count was 563 kings and final escapement was 1,256 kings. Chum passage ranks 13th out of 17 years. Pink passage ranks seventh out of nine even-numbered years.

Unalakleet River floating weir-

(No weir escapement goals yet established)–330 kings, 36,721 chums, 516,232 pinks, 173 sockeyes and 175 silvers. The king count is less than half the 2010 count and one-third the 2011 count. The chum count is 20 percent below the 2010 count and one-third the 2011 count. The pink count is one-quarter below the 2010 count.

Crab tagging project underway in Norton Sound

The Alaska Department of Fish and Game has a new Fish and Wildlife Technician from Anchorage and she's helping to conduct a red king crab research project in eastern Norton Sound. Mary Sherbick, born and raised in Anchorage, attends the University of Alaska Anchorage and is majoring in biology. She is a member of the Alaska Native Science and Engineering Program for about four years now. ANSEP encourages indigenous Alaskans to become scientists through middle and high school outreach initiatives, summer programs, college courses, and professional internships. Through ANSEP, Sherbick has interned with the U.S. Geological Survey and as a lab technician for UAA professor Frank von Hippel. "Since Î have plenty of lab experience under my belt I figured it was time for a change of pace and get my hands dirty with some field work," she said. So, off to Nome she went.

ADF&G Research Fishery Biologist Jenefer Bell hired Sherbick to work as a Fish and Wildlife technician on a research project. The project, done in cooperation with NSEDC and funded by the North Pacific Research Board, is to examine movement, size composition, and bycatch of red king crab, aka Paralithodes camtschaticus, in eastern Norton Sound. "We tagged over 4,500 crabs from Cape Nome to Elim chartering the F/V Mithril, Frank McFarland's boat," Sherbick said. "We used 90 collapsible crab pots weighing around 130 lbs each. We had two strings, 5 and 10 miles from shore with 45 pots running along each. To get a good look at the population we tagged males and females, legals, anything 4.75 inches in shell width, and sublegals." They did not tag crab smaller than 70 mm in carapace length but did record the size and gender. Now that the commercial crabbing season has started Bill Dunker with ADF&G, Mike McGowan with NSEDC and Sherbick have been observing on willing commercial crab boats to collect locations of recovered tagged crab and examine bycatch. Captains can participate in the study without an observer aboard by taking part in the crew program. In this case they fill out data sheets which will provide information similar to what an observer would record. Over the next three years ADF&G and NSEDC hope to get a better perspective on crab movement and population structure that will help in evaluating current guideline harvest levels and management of Norton Sound red king crab. Boat captains interested in participating in the study can contact Jenefer Bell or Justin Leon at 443-5167 for observer and crew program details.

USGS tags walruses in the Chukchi Sea

By Diana Haecker

Among the many barges, ships and dredges out at sea in front of Nome last weekend was the Norseman II, a research vessel that arrived in Nome from the Chukchi Sea last week. Chad Jay, a research ecologist with the Alaska Science Center at the United States Geological Survey in Anchorage, has been on board and reported that he and his research team was successful in tagging 40 adult female Pacific walruses with satellite radio transmitters.

The researchers were at the southern edge of the sea ice, northwest of Wainright. According to Jay, the purpose of the USGS's multi-year study is to identify the foraging and migration patterns and the distribution of walruses and how the patterns change as the sea ice diminishes increasingly in the fall due to climate change. When the sea ice recedes past the continental shelf - and their food source - into very deep waters of the Arctic Basin, the walruses haul out on land, Jav said.

The ongoing study has revealed that walruses haul out increasingly on land, rest onshore and swim out to foraging grounds, which can be 30 to 40 miles offshore. "We found that some animals are swimming upwards of 60 miles on foraging trips," Jay said. He also said that some animals tagged in the eastern Chukchi Sea end up on the opposite shore, in

According to the USGS website, the Alaska Science Center Pacific Walrus Research Program has collected data on walrus foraging behavior and movements throughout areas of the Bering and Chukchi seas during periods when sea ice is present and when sea ice is absent over the continental shelf since 2004. In 2010, walruses came ashore in late August. Last year, the sea ice disappeared from the shelf earlier and walruses began to come ashore in early August.

The study will be taken into account when the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service makes it decision whether or not to list the Pacific walrus species as threatened. The decision will be made in 2017. Jay said that the reduced sea ice conditions do affect walruses in their foraging and resting behavior.

Jay said the tagging teams are using crossbow to embed the radio transmitter in the animals' blubber. If at all possible, he asks subsistence hunters to spare radio-tagged animals, but if taken, to please return the radio back to the USGS office in Anchorage.

Unalakleet Humpy derby draws anglers of all ages

Unalakleet fishermen and women turned out in force on July 6 and 7 to fish in the Humpy Derby organized by Francine Johnson, Kawerak

Tribal Family Coordinator, who was planning the event as part of the Family Fun Time program.

Elders showed up and fished to their heart's content. The derby started at noon on July 6th and ended not until midnight. Laughter and smiles prevailed and some kids begged to keep fishing after midnight. The first day ended with over 300 humpies caught. Three-hundred fish were donated to the Elders and stored in the cannery for the next day to cut and give to the Elders.

The next day, at 8:30 a.m. sharp kids and community members once again came down to participate in the derby and the last fish was weighed at 5 p.m. A picnic consisting of 300 hamburgers, watermelon and Capri Suns followed with generous donations from Kawerak, Norton Sound Health Corporation, and the Native Village of Unalakleet, Unalakleet General Store, Peace on Earth, Hansen Grocery of Nome, Norton Sound Sled Dog Club. Every participant entered into a raffle for donated round-trip tickets by Bering Air and PenAir.

Johnson hopes to run this event annually. She said it's time to create activities in all communities based on families and this is just the beginning to dreams of making a change in a community.

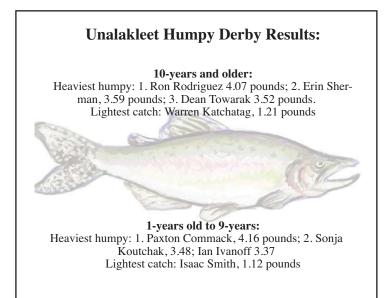

After the picnic a table was set up by Davida and Bret Hanson to help teach anyone how to cut a humpy. They cut an estimated 100 fish caught on July 7 and then more fish cutters joined in to cut over 300 fish caught on July 6. The fish were cut and donated to Elders in the community. Johnson thanks Davida and Bret Hanson, Darlene Katchatag, Jeff and Donna Erickson and Harvey Brown. Nick Hanson JoAnne Semeken and Kiki Storms were youth who came to learn and stick with fish cutting for the Elders.

Prizes for ages 1-9 were for the Heaviest Humpy to the Lightest Humpy, up to sixth place received a prize. Prizes for ages 10-Elder were from Heaviest Humpy to the Lightest Humpy with prizes for the top 13 participants.

THE DOCK WALK

By Diana Haecker

The Port and Harbor of Nome resembles a busy beehive these days with cargo barges, gold dredges, lighterage vessels, fishing boats and research vessels coming and going at a fast pace. Nome Harbormaster Joy Baker gives a weekly report on traffic in and out of the port and harbor, and this week had a heck of a time to read her own logs so tightly were words spaced on the whiteboard calendar. Baker said that Thursday and Friday were very busy days when vessels waited in line to get inside the port or harbor for discharging and loading cargo, refueling, getting water or conducting repairs.

Baker reports that the U.S. Coast Guard buoy tender Hickory visited Nome last week Monday and Tuesday to conduct small vessel safety checks and to give crew some wellearned R&R time on land.

An Alaska Logistics barge arrived with stacks of containers, bringing more goods into Nome. Also, a bowhead freight barge arrived in Nome to transload cargo to landing crafts for the trek to the Arctic; one gravel barge came and went; and seven landing crafts made trips in and out of the harbor to move freight to the surrounding villages. The Norseman

II research ship spent time anchored outside the port during heavy traffic periods, but was able to get to the dock over the weekend. The Professor Khromov research vessel also called on Nome again Friday and Saturday.

Researchers aboard the Norseman II report they completed a walrustagging mission for the U.S. Geological Survey and tagged 40 female adult walrus with satellite radio collars. (See related story on page 7).

The Seabird, a tender, delivered herring from East Norton Sound to the Norton Sound Seafood processing plant to be used as crab bait in the red king crab fishery.

Vitus Marine's tugs Naniq and Cavek await the arrival of the tanker Orestina to assist into the causeway dock and have been assisting the Moor in delivering fuel to coastal villages.

Plantar Fasciitis: How to Heal the Heel

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Plantar fasciitis is a common cause of foot pain typically localized to the bottom of the foot near the heel. It is often caused by a sudden increase in activity or a change in footwear.

The pain from plantar fasciitis is typically worse in the morning or after sitting for extended periods. Many people with the condition describe a sharp pain under the heel on the first few steps of the day. The pain tends to improve with activity or stretching.

Without proper treatment, ... plantar fasciitis can become a chronic annoying pain that prevents healthy levels of activity, or at least takes away any fun associated with being active. But if the problem is recognized early, treatment can result in rapid recovery and possibly prevent a trip to the doctor.

The plantar fascia is a thick semielastic band of tissue that extends from the bottom of the heel to the ball of the foot.

The pain of plantar fasciitis results from a sudden overstretching of the fibers of the plantar fascia. This sudden stretching causes micro tears in the fibers that attach the fascia to the base of the heel leading to inflammation and pain. If the problem is allowed to persist for a long time a small extension of bone will develop off the tip of the heel forming a sharp spur seen on x-ray. The "heel spur" is not the cause of pain, only a sign that the problem may have been present for a long time.

Treatment for plantar fasciitis is straightforward. Stretching the plantar fascia on both feet, even if only one side is hurting, is the most important part of therapy.

Proper stretching is performed by leaning with arms outstretched against a wall with one leg extended behind you, taking care to ensure the toes of both feet are pointed forward and both heels are lowered to the floor. If this maneuver is too difficult, one may also stretch the fascia by looping a towel or elastic band around the ball of the foot and then pulling upward toward the knee. In general, any stretch that stretches the calf or Achilles tendon will also stretch the plantar fascia.

Next, use ice over the affected area for 15 minutes at a time. This is best performed at the end of the day to reduce any inflammation. Some people find a frozen water bottle rolled under the foot makes a handy tool for both stretching and icing the plantar fascia.

Third, consider using a night splint. Most people sleep with their toes pointed downward. This leaves the plantar fascia in a shortened position for hours, which explains why the first few steps of the day can be the most painful. Night splints designed to keep toes pointed up during sleep can be purchased online or in some cases be specially made by your provider. These splints keep the fascia stretched during the night so that waking pain is reduced. Fourth, ensure your shoes have proper arch support or use orthotics that more evenly distribute pressure on the feet.

Fifth, consider modifying your activity to allow time for the plantar fascia to heal. This could mean switching physical activities. Runners may choose to swim or ride a bike for a few weeks.

If these measures fail to address heel pain, see your doctor to ensure the diagnosis is correct and rehabilitation maneuvers are being performed properly. An x-ray may be ordered to rule out other causes of foot pain. Your provider can also discuss further treatment options including physical therapy or corticosteroid injection.

Saying It Sincerely

By Rev. Karen Sonray. Our Savior's Lutheran Church Member, Nome Ministerial Association

"A great windstorm arose, and the waves beat into the boat, so that the boat was already being swamped. But Jesus was in the stern, asleep on the cushion." Mark 4: 37

This is one of my favorite bible stories—Jesus asleep in the boat as the storm rages and the disciples cry out, "Lord, don't you care that we are perishing?" I think we can all relate to this universal cry, "Don't you care,

In Seminary we talked about our experience of God as both "distant" and "close" - the transcendent and the immanent God. In this story God seems "asleep" to our storms. But then as a parent I am reminded of the many times I have "looked out the window" - at a distance — keeping an eye on my children as they were outside playing. I had my eye on them watching with concern though it seemed as if I were oblivious and removed.

God gives us a large amount of freedom and does not treat us as His puppets but His children. Thus, when we find ourselves in things beyond our control, feeling helpless we may think God is distant. But God is filled with concern and we are the object of that concern.

God sends Jesus into the midst of our storms. Jesus falls asleep on a pillow! Why? Perhaps Jesus can rest in the midst of nature's turmoils; He knows no matter what happens he is in God's hands. Not even death is to be feared. He is our example of complete faith.

Jesus' cry, "Peace be still." not only rebukes the winds and stills the waves of the chaotic ocean, but it is meant for us and our inner emotions and spirit: "Have faith God is here."

As you are out in the land and the sea and enjoying God's creation this summer, be still and know that God is there, too, watching from a distance and yet also right there in the midst of your "boat."

Remember Jesus' words: "Why are you afraid? Have you still no (Mark 4: 40) God can transform our fears to a sense of awe and faith.

There were no injuries

CHIEF'S NOTES:

It's hard to believe that we're halfway through the summer and looking at the approach of fall in about a month. It's been a busy season for everybody including the young people in our community.

Looking through the media releases this last month, the number of juveniles who have been contacted and who have been consuming alcohol is getting higher, but the ages are getting lower. Some of the youths we are contacting are 12 and many are less than 15. One of the more alarming aspects though is that these young people are drinking substantial quantities of alcohol; in many cases to levels where they require medical inter-

The hazards of youth are many without alco-hol creating an entirely new tier of potential vic-tims. Kids are the same as adults when it comes to alcohol. They have reduced judgment; impaired thought processes; impaired motor skills; and at times, become incapacitated. However, kids have increased risk because they are generally un-skilled in handling the effects of alcohol to their systems. Accidental injury is the #1 cause of death among young people with many of these events involving alcohol. It is critical that the community look out for the welfare of young peo ple who are at risk

To parents: know where your children are and who they are with. Check up on them to insure they are safe and keep track of any alcohol you may have around your residence as this fre-quently is a source of the alcohol kids are drinking. To kids: be careful and don't consume alcohol. Accidents occur every day that involve alcohol and alcohol incapacitation is the number one contributing factor to sexual assault and other victimization. And to the community: help us keep our youth safe. Report intoxicated youths immediately and provide as much specific information as possible. Look for and report adults who are hosting parties or buying alcohol

With your help, we can help insure that the youth of today have a future tomorrow.

Please report any suspicious situation to the Nome Police at 443-5262. Or if you have information about a crime, you can call us at 443-5262 or email us at nomepolice@hotmail.com

PINGO— Erica Pryzmont presents her new seafood restaurant and bakery Pingo. Having worked as an attorney for years, she decided it was time for a career change and went to culinary school from 2009 to 2010 with the idea to eventually open her own restaurant in Nome.

New bakery and seafood restaurant opens in Nome

By Diana Haecker

Some things need to simmer and stew for a while until they're good and ready. The same holds true for dreams and their fulfillment.

When Erica Pryzmont, 37, opened the door to her brand new bakery and seafood restaurant "Pingo" at 308 Bering Street in May, a decade-long dream had become reality for her and her husband Phil Pryzmont.

The Pryzmonts have come far to make this dream happen, including a career change for Erica and a lot of hours of building and remodeling the eating place for the husband, who also is a full-time fisherman.

Erica Pryzmont, a native of Wyoming and a lawyer, has been working as a public defender in Nome when she quit her job in 2009 to attend culinary school for two years at the University of Alaska in Anchorage.

Always having had an interest in the culinary art and having worked at restaurants while attending law school at the University of Wyoming in Laramie, she wanted to learn more and develop different skills. "People go to culinary school for all kinds of reasons," Pryzmont said. "I had one very specific reason: I knew that I wanted to open up my own restaurant and bakery. It was fun going to school knowing exactly what I wanted to do with it," Pryzmont said. She graduated with honors in 2010 with an Associate degree of Culinary

On top of the degree, Pryzmont aspires to get the professional certification from the Alaska Culinary Federation, which is the equivalent of the bar exam for the culinary trade

The Pryzmonts' bought the restaurant a few years ago and began remodeling with the help of friends in 2011. In its past, the building has housed a lawyer and at a different time in its history, it was a Chinese restaurant and later a "Burger Barn". Now, the interior offers a three-table seating area, a brand new kitchen and a bakery rack. "The concept of the restaurant is to prepare freshly made food, simply presented and delicious," Pryzmont said. She focuses her menu on seafood items and offers seafood caught in Norton Sound, like fresh salmon, red king crab and halibut. "It's nice to be able to serve food that has been locally caught," she said. Although the menu changes, depending on what's in season, the constants are the house seafood omelet, house chocolate chip cookies or pistachio/white chocolate chip cookies and at least two types of bread as well as cinnamon rolls for breakfast. At times, she even prepares homemade ice-cream.

Pryzmont still works full time at the Nome Court, and on the weekends exchanges her business suit for the chef's apron. For now, she said, she'll be the one cooking, baking, waiting on tables and then doing the dishes as well. She gives credit to her husband Phil, "He has put in a ton of work and friends also pitched in and helped," she said. Despite applying at marketplace-type grant competitions for small businesses, the Pryzmonts weren't awarded a grant but were able to finance their restaurant and bakery dream the conventional way: with savings, loans and the help of a family member. "Lots of people gave me their time in helping to build, and I even have been given kitchen utensils," Pryzmont said. She plans to open the bakery and restaurant a few nights a week, but that is still in the future. "For now, I focus on making good food and feeding folks on the weekends," Pryzmont said. So far, business is brisk, she said. "I'm very pleased the way things are going.

Pingo is the geological term for a hill on the tundra created by a frost heave, explained Pryzmont. She's always liked those land features and when they bought the building, an island-shaped dormer on the front reminded her of a pingo. And, bingo, there was the name.

The Pingo Seafood House and Bakery is open on Friday 4 to 7 p.m. (bakery counter with soup and bread) and on Saturday and Sunday from 7:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. (bakery and restaurant)

WELCOME— Erica Pryzmont opened the doors to Pingo Seafood House and Bakery in May.

FCC to help expand broadband services in rural Alaska

By Diana Haecker

The Federal Communications Commission last October decided to modernize U.S. communications infrastructure and to expand broadband services to underserved areas through a new "Connect America" fund that aims to connect all Americans to broadband. More than 14,000 rural Alaskans should benefit from the Connect America fund once the build-out is completed. While the expansion has been decided at the policy level, now programs need to be created to make it a reality.

Three high-level officials with the Federal Communications Commission office of Native Affairs and Policy visited Nome and other parts of Northwestern Alaska last week to get a handle on what is needed in communication infrastructure and policy in rural Alaska. Although their meeting in Nome to hear from the public was poorly advertised and only announced a few days prior to their arrival, more than a dozen people found their way to Old St. Joe's last Wednesday. The message was clear and simple: Northwest Alaskans crave fast, reliable and reasonably priced Internet service and improved cell phone service. Pearl Mikulski, vice president of community services at Kawerak Inc., stressed the importance of the FCC officials to have come out to Northwestern Alaska and to witness first hand the difficulties its residents face.

The FCC regulates everything that has to do with airwaves: television, radio, telephone, cell phone and Internet. "By the time you have your first sip of coffee, the FCC has already touched your life in multiple ways: listening to the radio as you wake up, watching the morning news on TV and maybe checking your messages on your phone," Geoffrey Blackwell told the audience at last week's meeting. Blackwell explained that they want to go where the problems are. Under those premises, they hit the jackpot. Blackwell, chief of the FCC office of Native Affairs and Policy, along with Daniel Rumelt, senior policy advisor, and Irene Flannery, deputy chief, experienced the gaps in service first hand when they traveled to Noatak, where their cell phones told them 'no service' and that they appeared to have traveled out of the country. And when they had to use the internet in Kotzebue or Nome, they felt they were taken back to a distant past. "The Internet connection was so slow [...] we don't even remember if we ever experienced this slow of a service," Rumelt said.

How can the FCC help, given that they are regulators, not an agency dishing out grant money? Barb Nickels with the Nome Chamber of Commerce asked, "What can we do to help you help us?" Blackwell answered to provide comment that he can take to the commission. "The hardest part of my job is to build the record," he said.

Jim Stimpfle vented his frustration. "Our service here is so slow, you can't even download a movie on our regular GCI or TelAlaska service, much less Skype," Stimpfle said. 'The Bering Strait School District

Nome man pleads guilty in strangulation death

By Sandra L. Medearis

Shawn Oquilluk will likely serve less than 30 years in prison after a night of domestic violence that left his girlfriend dead in the couple's home.

Last Oct. 7, police found the body of Marie Pushruk, 21, on the floor of the house with Oquilluk, also 21, lying beside it. A bloody steak knife was stabbed into the floor nearby. The woman appeared to have been strangled.

The state charged Oquilluk on Murder One—with intent to cause death, according to court documents. Oquilluk pleaded innocent. In a plea deal, Oquilluk pleaded guilty Monday afternoon to an amended charge of second- degree murder-with intent to do injury, with the court agreeing to cap the sentence at 30 years plus probation and additional conditions to be set by sentence. Judge Ben Esch set the sentencing

Oquilluk, dressed in a gold prison uniform, buried his head in his hands and appeared overcome with emotion as he squeezed out the word "guilty" after a long hesitation.

"I think this is very hard for him," Oquilluk's attorney, Angela M. Green told the court.

After the proceedings, Brenda Pushruk, Marie Pushruk's mom, and other family members, including continued on page 4

On June 14, 2012, the Alaska Native Heritage Center hosted a celebration for the passage of SB 130: an Act Establishing an Alaska Native Language Preservation and Advisory Council. Special guests of this celebration included Alaska's Lieutenant Governor Mead Treadwell, the primary sponsors of the bill State Senator Donald Olson and State Representative Alan Dick, former State Senator Georgianna Lincoln, and many other individuals and organizations who worked hard to support the successful passage of this landmark Alaska Native Legislation.

Disappearing King Salmon

As you know, the governor requested the federal government declare this summer's low king salmon returns a disaster. If Washington, D.C. does issue a disaster declaration this would provide much needed financial aid to our struggling villages. I am hopeful that this will happen. My office is monitoring this, and if you have any questions please don't hesitate to contact us.

Also, the governor has appointed a team to take a comprehensive look at why the king salmon runs have been so dismal. This team is directed to issue a report and make recommendations this fall. I look forward to reviewing this report and making it available to my constituents. It is my hope that the legislature can enter the next legislative session with a solid plan to address this resource that is so important and closely tied to the families and communities that I represent in the Senate.

Thank you for taking the time to read my Ulu Newsletter. I wish everyone a pleasant summer.

Take care, Senator Donald Olson

Dear Editor,

GOLOVIN BAY people better wake up. The future is NOW— develop the infrastructure NOW— for transportation roads, etc. Golovin Bay could have a deepwater port to rival ANY in the state and USA. Start NOW. If YOU CAN'T DO IT, find someone who can. Get it STARTED. Inter-organizational squabbling gets NOWHERE FAST.

DUELING LAPTOPS – Cousins Charlie Burrow and Rodger Hughes were in Nome last week tracing their family history at the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum. They are cousins of Lucy and John Poling. Their grandfather, Albert Spaeth, spent the winter of 1900 in a tent on Nome's beach. Their mothers returned to Nome in the early 1930s as teachers and met their husbands here. Charlie's parents lived in Candle working for ACS while Rodger's dad, Howard Hughes, was Nome's dentist in the 1930s. Left to right, trading stories are Anne Peterson Whipple, Charlie Burrow, Augie Krutzsch and Rodger Hughes. Fritz, lead dog of the 1925 Serum Run listens in.

THE OLD TOWN STILL LOOKS THE SAME – George Madsen Jr. was eleven years old when his family left Nome in 1951. Over the years, daughter Julie grew so curious about her Dad's intriguing stories about his life in the Gold Rush City that they travelled to Nome last week to relive some of those memories. They found several photos in the Curtis Jacobs Collection at the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum to take back home.

A Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

In the spirit of the 1900 Nome Gold Rush, the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum is pleased to continue "The 1900 Diary of Wilfred A. McDaniel" in the next several issues of The Nome Nugget newspaper.

Wilfred McDaniel was 25 years old when he first landed at Nome in June 1900 in the midst of the largest gold rush in Alaska. Wilfred was a gifted photographer, writer, artist, poet and an amateur dentist. During the eight years he lived in Nome he

In the last issue of The Nome Nugget newspaper, the brothers Wilfred and Ed dealt with the tragic death of their fellow miner Ed Rouse, who is still buried in Nome. It's starting to get darker at night as the Midnight Sun begins to wane. Now it's time for some weather to set in ...

July 30, 1900

Started as usual this morning. Some soldiers came by but did not notice us. One returned with nine prisoners. We worked out a pit 24 x 1 ft. cleaned up the bedrock. Found a small nugget today. The only one we have seen from the beach. Al Raney came up to camp today. He bought a pumping plant for $200 and will locate next to us.

July 31, 1900

Al staid with us all night. No hard trouble again with our pump. The sea is rough and the surf is full of sea moss. It gets into the pump runner and clogs it up. Ed went to a miner's meeting this afternoon. Lots of talk about the beach. We worked until 9:15 p.m. The water jacket on the engine became clogged with sand and moss so that we had to stop.

August 1, 1900

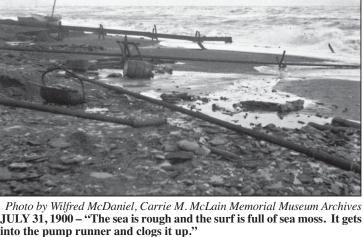

All the pumping plants are stopped today as there is a rumor that we are all to be arrested today. We took our boxes down and cleaned up. The weather is getting very stormy and the sea is getting rough. We took supper with Al Raney.

lugged his 20-pound Kodak camera from town to beach claim through rugged creeks and mosquito infested tundra, during powerful Bering Sea storms and furious blizzards. All the while he wrote descriptive letters to his parents in California and maintained a diary covering almost every day he lived on the coast west of Nome.

The result of this determined perseverance is the documentation of the lives of successful beach miners in the Nome gold rush era as well as an insight into the Eskimo people who lived at the Penny, Cripple and Sinuk Rivers at that time. Wilfred died at the age of 80 in 1954. However his thoughts, memories and love of Nome are preserved forever as his legacy in the "McDaniel Family Collection" now owned and on exhibit at Nome's Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum. Nome men injured in house fire, one medivaced to Seattle

By Diana Haecker

A fire at 105 E. Kings Way in Nome injured two men and burned down the arctic entry of the residence

Jerry Steiger with the Nome Volunteer Fire Department said that the fire was called in at 6:05 a.m. on Saturday, July 28. When NVFD fire engines arrived, they found the entrance burning and a man on the roof.

"One person had escaped through an upstairs window to the roof, and we rescued that person from the roof," Steiger said. According to a police report, the person was Walter Rose, 50. As the firefighters prepared for the roof rescue, they worked on extinguishing the fire in the arctic entrance way. Once the flames were extinguished, they made entry and found a second victim, Conrad Klemzak, 54, on the floor, overcome by heat and the smoke.

Nome Ambulance Department volunteers took Klemzak and Rose to the Norton Sound Regional hospital for treatment of burns and smoke inhalation.

NPD reports that Klemzak was medivaced to Seattle for treatment of significant and critical injuries. His last condition report was critical.

Steiger said that it was a relatively small, contained fire, but it produced a fair amount of heat and smoke. By 7:30 a.m., the fire was extinguished.

The cause of the fire is still under investigation, said Steiger. "We ruled out electrical causes," Steiger said.

The state fire marshal came to Nome and is investigating the fire.

"He took some evidence with him for further investigation and testing," Steiger said.

ON LISTENING TOUR—FCC officials Irene Flannery and Geoffrey Blackwell toured Northwest Alaska including Nome to get a handle on problems that stand in the way of expanding communications service in rural Alaska.

and Norton Sound Health Corporation have fast speeds, but the villages stay in poverty if they don't get faster services. Can't we let the public use their infrastructure?" asked Stimpfle. Well, they can't share the services with the public, Robin Johnson of Nome Public Schools said, but it would be possible to open an access point. Stimpfle brought up the importance new social media plays in village life. "I have seen how Facebook can make a difference and save a suicidal kid's life. What a difference Internet service could make! But there are only so many jobs in Teller and many cannot afford to pay for Internet access." Tom Gray chimed in, saying that his wife counsels kids on Facebook. "I know for a fact that Facebook has stopped people from killing themselves," Gray

Ken Hughes with Hughes.net brought a different perspective to the table and said that the FCC should do away with many regulations that restrict private enterprise. The problems of slow speed and expensive service are compounded by limited choice in providers.

In the Norton Sound and Bering Strait regions, only GCI, TelAlaska, Starband and Hughes.net provide Internet service. The FCC says Alaska Communications accepted nearly $4.2 million to increase broadband access in Alaska. Alaska Communications must complete two-thirds of its new broadband commitments within two years, and the remainder by the third year.

Another comment was that Alaska Natives could sell their art online, if they could afford to pay top dollars for the slow service they're getting.

Tom Gray, speaking of his experience as a hunting guide, told the commissioners that it takes 30 minutes to download the Anchorage Daily News, and when he tried to skype with a client, it took his conversation partner half an hour to hear Gray's voice.

Blackwell said that they don't need to be convinced that rural Alaska wants faster and more reliable Internet service. But he needs to hear specific comment from tribal entities on proposals, such as turning the Lifeline service to the internet.

Lifeline is a universal service providing telephone access to low-income residents for $1 a month. "We analyse the feasibility in real life, and we are interested to see if there is a $1 per month program that would be effective, but we do need to build the record. So, yes, we are looking at how to create a low-income program for broadband services," Blackwell said. "It's not enough to hear it, but we need reason and analysis and responses. The greatest challenge I have is building the record," Blackwell explained.

The FCC officials also visited Kawerak, NSHC, met with city officials, the Nome Police Chief and the Fire chief small children, comforted each other and left the courthouse in tears. They had no immediate comment.

In their investigation, police found a camera that had recorded two videos the night of the murder. One showed Pushruk relaxing with a beer and texting on her phone, with nothing visibly amiss. The other video showed Oquilluk in the home with blood on his face as he played his guitar.

For the Pushruk family of Teller, this is the second violent death at the hands of another. About five years ago, Patrick "Rudy" Pushruk was beaten to death in Teller. Eli Dickson pleaded guilty to manslaughter in that death. His sentence was 16 years with five suspended.

Esch made sure that Oquilluk understood the consequences of a guilty plea. The judge then accepted the guilty plea. In doing so, he told Oquilluk he could draw a sentence of 99 years on a conviction of second-degree murder as an unclassified felony, but that in this case, it would be capped at 30 years.

NovaGold shares plunge after Barrick decides to put Donlin Creek mine on ice

By Diana Haecker

NovaGold Resources, former owner of the Rock Creek mine and still owner of Alaska Gold Co. took a huge hit at the stock market last week, seeing its shares plunge 25 percent down to a historic low of $4.20 per share. The loss came at the heels of Barrick Gold's announcement that they will not go into construction mode at Donlin Creek at this time. Barrick Gold and NovaGold are 50/50 partners in the Donlin Gold LLC. The Barrick second quarter report states that Donlin Gold currently doesn't meet Barrick's investment criteria. The report says that under Barrick's disciplined capital allocation framework, they will not make the decision to construct at this time. The reason: too expensive to build. However, the Barrick report also says that the project holds "valuable long-term opportunities" and that they would go forward with permitting activities. Last Thursday, the first permit applications were handed in at the Alaska Dept. of Natural Resources.

While gold production giant Barrick still has other projects in production, the Canadian NovaGold Resources Inc. put all its eggs in one basket: Donlin Creek. Financial commentator Rich Duprey with the Motley Fool report at the Daily Finance website wrote, "It wasn't so simple as a dour outlook that sank NovaGold Resources, but rather its whole reason for existence is called into question.'

NovaGold sold its idle Rock

Creek mine in Nome to Bering Straits Native Corporation, pending contractual provisions dealing with the mine's reclamation. It sold more than 11,000 acres of patented mining claims around Nome to Nome Gold Alaska, a new mining company also based in Canada. NovaGold negotiates with BSNC about the sale of the Alaska Gold Company, based in Nome. NovaGold also put its 50 percent share of the Galore Creek project on the market. In addition to the shedding of high-cost projects, NovaGold undertook some restructuring, spun off NovaCopper and placed former CEO and president of NovaGold Rick van Nieuwenhuyse at the helm of NovaCopper. Van Nieuwenhuyse was replaced by former Barrick Gold top executive,

NovaGold execs reasoned that they want to concentrate all their efforts on Donlin Creek, and that's why, for example, Rock Creek didn't fit in their portfolio anymore. Getting a taste of the disappointment that such a decision brings, NovaGold felt the pain at the stock market immediately after Barrick's announcement last week

Developing Donlin Creek poses more hurdles than it took to build the mine at Rock Creek. There is no road access to Donlin, no power plant site, and the last cost estimate put the price tag at $6 billion to develop the mine. This would include construction of a $1 billion gas line from Cook Inlet to Donlin Creek, across the Alaska Range, with sections along the historic Iditarod trail. For good public relations, Donlin Gold LLC became one of the primary sponsors of the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog race last year.

In a press release, NovaGold responded to Barrick's decision by saying that it is reasonable for Barrick not to be making a construction decision on this new, large-scale project at this time. "NovaGold similarly is not making such a decision. The timeline of the permitting process means the co-owners have approximately four years to make any major decision on the Project.' Other than investors having lost a whole lot of money - John Paulson's hedge fund owned 13 percent of NG stocks, and lost $64 million in one day - NovaGold maintains that Barrick Gold's announcement does not represent any change in the project status or direction for the next four years.

With the annual expenditures at Donlin Gold through the permitting process expected to be a modest $40 million on a 100 percent basis over several years, the co-owners of the project have an incredible opportunity to optimize capital and operating costs and yet take full advantage of Donlin Gold's significant leverage to the price of gold in an environment of what the company strongly believes is a secular bull market in gold," Greg Lang said in a press re-pump the sludge out of the tank. "We realized that it was more than we can handle," said Dunham. By then he put water conservation measures in effect because the problem got worse when more water entered the system. "It never backed up into the facility," Dunham said.

With the kitchen using most of the water during the day, meals got restricted to hot breakfast and dinner. with a sack meal for lunch. Showers could only be used between 7 p.m. and 9:45 p.m. And after 10 p.m., laundry was done. "The reason was to control the water surges," said Dunham.

By July 23, the problem got worse. Now Dunham was operating under time pressure to solve in a few days what has never been done before in Alaska. For the first time in Alaska prison history, a septic failed and the entire facility was facing evacuation if the problem wasn't solved in four days' time. On top of that the City's pump truck brought in to pump the waste off the top in the tank had a mechanical and was not available. "By the time the contractor arrived, the tank was not empty enough to lower anybody in. When we first removed the hatch, it was full to the top," Dunham said.

That Monday, Dunham had to put the facility into water restriction mode. At 8 a.m., the water was turned off. The kitchen staff had baked 400 loaves of bread in preparation to feed sack meals only for the next few days. Water was only turned on every four hours to flush toilets and for prisoners to perform basic hygiene. The 91 prisoners were given two bottles of water that they were supposed to refill when the water was turned on in the four-hour intervals. Neither showers nor laundry were allowed. To lessen the load, 37 prisoners were shipped out to over their heads, the Dept. of Corrections authorized that Dunham draw up a special contract for a Palmer contractor to come to Nome and fix the problem. But there was no easy solution to it. The tank measures 30 feet, is 10 feet high and round. The first 20 feet are to separate the solids from the liquid and at 20 feet is a baffle system to hold back the solids. The entire tank was backed up and pushed everything out to the leech field. The access hatch is at five feet, leaving another 15 feet of solids that the pump truck

The Palmer experts were to access the tank, break up the solids and get it toward the hatch so that it can get pumped out. When the contractor came with one safety officer and a supervisor, the supervisor wouldn't let his worker inside the tank that's how bad it was. The goal of cleaning was not accomplished, but some of the waste was pumped out to leave four feet of sludge in the tank. The problem is not solved for good, but at least it will get the prison over the winter, Dunham said.

The replacement of the 1985 installed septic system has been a capital funds project for several years, but had been postponed because a connected project, the replacement of an utilidor between the boiler room and the facility had cost overruns. No additional state funds were appropriated to the $3 million project. Next summer, the prison will get a new septic system consisting of two 8,000-gallon tanks, a grinder

This was the first time a prison in the state had to deal with this," Dunham said. "When it was all over, I thanked the prisoners for their understanding. They did an excellent job coping with this." But, yes, Dunham said, tensions did start to rise. "It was a stressful time for staff and

By Diana Haecker

Weatherwise, last week was nasty. Record-breaking rainfall and stormy conditions kept gold miners from working, and things got "cozy" inside the harbor as all kinds of boats and vessels snuggled up next to each other. In her weekly update to The Nome Nugget, Harbormaster Joy Baker says that Port of Nome staff managed to stack vessels nicely inside the harbor and that everybody had adequate shelter from the storm.

Here is who came and went from the Nome Port and small boat harbor: On Monday, two fuel lighter barges were tucked in the harbor as the storm approached. The research vessel Norseman II left that morn-

On Tuesday, the U.S. Coast Guard vessel Sycamore arrived and anchored offshore. The three sailboats that have been sitting inside the small boat harbor were joined by a fourth sailboat, also trying to sail the Northwest Passage.

On Wednesday not much happened as the Sycamore was still anchored outside, and the two fuel lighter barges were still tucked in at the small boat harbor.

On Thursday, the Orestina, a tanker running under Gibraltar flag with a Russian crew, came into the Port to offload fuel for Bonanza Fuel. A landing craft running village cargo and the two lighter fuel barges were still in the harbor, waiting for better weather.

On Friday, a landing craft arrived to move village cargo.

On Saturday, a gravel barge came in. This time, it didn't take on gravel for export, but it delivered armor stone for the Snake River bridge replacement from southwest Alaska. NSEDC's vessels, the Egavik and the Inaliq are constantly making runs between Nome and east Norton Sound to deliver bait and fish to the Norton Sound Seafood Products plant.

A 150-foot landing craft called the Polarbear showed up on Saturday. The Polarbear is going to be the platform to conduct core drilling for Denali Drilling, hired on by the South African gold company Auru-Mar, which scored several large tract leases in the DNR offshore lease auction last September.

Also on Saturday, the 417-foot long tanker Moor - also under Russian flag - anchored offshore to lighter fuel for Nome Joint Utilities.

The Korean icebreaker Araon arrived in Nome to drop off researchers, to get their marine inspection taking care of and gearing up for the next voyage.

The Alaska Logistics landing craft Kaktovik, of fame as the vessel that last year was tossed on the rocks inside the port and leaked some oil, is back in business and has been delivering village freight throughout this summer.

Baker said that the number of vessels hiding from the weeklong storm gave port staff a good idea how to go stack them up for next time – when there is another storm and even more boats trying to run for shelter. "We just squeezed them in and the next time we have to do it, we'll need to stack up and squeeze in even more boats." Baker said.

On Monday morning, the skies cleared and the four sailboats left Nome onward with their quest to navigate the Northwest Passage.

TUCKED IN - Bad weather forced the smaller vessels to hunker down at the Snake River mouth.

Record breaking rain swamps Nome

By Diana Haecker

Nome was on top of the list in terms of water that poured down last week. According to the National Weather Service in Nome, 4.72 inches of rain came down starting on Tuesday, July 24, making it the greatest seven-day total ever observed in Nome. Last week rivaled that of a torrid rainfall in the autumn of 1935 that produced 5.25 inches of rain in seven days.

On the days of July 25 and 28, the rain broke standing records. The pouring rain on Saturday broke a 101-year old record set in 1911.

In and around Nome, the rivers swelled immensely, and Alaska

Dept. of Fish and Game officials report that they suspended fish counting at the Kwiniuk River, the Niukluk River and the Pilgrim River due to high and turbid water.

The Nome, Snake and Eldorado fish weirs are also not working because of the high water.

This July with its 5.93 inches of rain will go into the record books as the third-wettest July on record, behind the wettest July in 1920 with 8.43 inches and 1922 with 6.2

Up until last week, the total precipitation for this year was 4.37

FLOODED— The Snake River weir was not operational due to high water. A record rainfall brought more than five inches of precipitation to Nome and the region. In northern Norton Sound, only Glacial Lake weir is still able to function and count at this time.

Rain hampers fish counting efforts

The Fish Report by Jim Menard, ADF&G Nome

The rains this past week knocked out the Eldorado, Nome and Snake River weirs early Thursday morning, July 26 and the Niukluk River tower crew has been unable to count since Thursday afternoon because of high and murky water. The newer model floating weirs at Pilgrim and Unalakleet Rivers are able to handle greater water flows and are still operational as is the weir at the outlet of Glacial Lake.

Norton Sound commercial salmon harvest to date is 203,000 pinks, 52,000 chums, 70 sockeyes, and 2,200 silvers. The pink salmon harvest is the best since 1998. Pink directed fishing periods have ended, but fishing for chums continues and silver catch numbers are increasing with each fishing period.

A mid-season assessment shows the king run was weak, the chum run was below average to average and the pink run was below average for an even-numbered year. A real outlier seen this year was Kwiniuk River where the chum escapement was the worst in the 48 years of tower counts.

Weather has kept most crab fishermen in the harbor since early this week and harvest levels are naturally falling off from the 2011 pace because there has been little harvest this week due to weather.

Crab:

This year's quota is 465,450 pounds and through the morning of July 28, commercial crab permit holders are halfway to the quota with 235,000 pounds harvested. There are 28 permit holders registered with 26 making deliveries so far this season.

Salmon:

Unalakleet and Shaktoolik Subdis-

In Unalakleet, the commercial harvest to date is 23,345 chums, 53,268 pinks, 47 sockeyes and 1,711 silvers. The chum harvest ranks 5th highest in 20 years and the pink harvest is the best since 1998.

In Shaktoolik, the commercial harvest to date is 18,260 chums, 19,400 pinks, 25 sockeyes and 330 silvers. The chum harvest ranks 4th highest in 20 years and the pink harvest is the best since 2000.

Norton Bay Subdistrict

Commercial harvest to date is 4,830 chums, 46,760 pinks and 70 silvers. The chum harvest ranks 3rd highest in 20 years and the pink harvest is a record.

Elim Subdistrict

Commercial harvest to date is 2,140 chums, 52,725 pinks and 10 silvers. The pink harvest is the best since 1998.

Golovin Subdistrict

No commercial fishing periods are scheduled at this time.

Commercial harvest to date is 3,668 chums, 31,225 pinks and 47 silvers. The pink harvest is the best since 1998

Nome Subdistrict

The department has switched to silver salmon management. High water knocked out all counting weirs in the subdistrict, except for Glacial weir. Following Wednesday's rainfall the weirs started to fall like dominos with Eldorado, Nome and Snake opened up by rising water in the early morning hours of Thursday.

Nome Subdistrict aerial surveys were completed just in time and combined with weir counts the estimated escapement of 50,000 chum salmon ranks it 5th highest in the last 10 years and exceeds the escapement goal range of 23,000 to 35,000 chum salmon.

Summercise brings out kids in record numbers

By Diana Haecker

It's not summer in Nome until Summercise starts in mid-June, and it's a sad affair when session two wraps up by the end of July. Tears are flowing as kids bid their summercise instructors farewell and go home with the message of healthy living, daily exercise and staying to-

Summercise, in its 13th year, is a program implemented by the CAMP department of Norton Sound Health Corporation. "Our focus is to prevent diabetes through introducing healthy eating habits and exercise," said Kendra Baggett, Summercise director with CAMP. Children get to choose from several classes ranging from cooking, traditional living and Native Youth Olympic disciplines to hiphop dancing, cheerleading, hiking, biking, flag football and even

This summer, 198 children from five to 13 years old participated that is up from 163 kids last summer. Over the years, the program has been growing and gained wide support among community members. The City of Nome grants the use of the Rec Center and staff time to the two summer sessions. The CAMP department hired eight interns from nutrition schools nationwide and brought them to Nome to teach Summercise as well as help Norton Sound with its diabetes prevention programs such as Step-by-step. Community volunteers also chip in and this year, three National Park Service employees took kids out on hikes and taught them about archeological digs in the area. Nome Eskimo Community volunteers also helped out and taught NYO classes along with Kaitlyn Tozier and traditional living cooking classes. Also, 10 assistants from Nome were hired to tame the hordes and assist the instructors. The fun everybody had was apparent in last Wednesday's final Summercise performance. The five- and six-year olds, marching in behind an instructor carrying the Olympic torch, performed a hiphop inspired dance, rapping about healthy foods and delivering smashing air-guitar performances. Next came a cheerleading performance, a yoga performance and a hiphop

Baggett said that the Summercise program is giving the children something to do when school is not in session and they are learning new things. "It gets them out there to play instead of sitting around and watching TV," Baggett said. In addition, the cooking classes introduce some children to new and healthy foods. "My 'favorite' comment was from a kid who said: 'I don't like this kind of salad," said Baggett. They were preparing fresh vegetable salad. When asked what other kind of salad the child likes, the response was, "Pasta salad." With this anecdotal example, Baggett brings home the point that eating fresh is sometimes an acquired taste and that Summercise is a powerful weapon in the arsenal to fight childhood obesity.

Twenty-nine runners and bikers compete in rainy Dexter Challenge

Photos and story by Diana Haecker

Wind-driven rain and chilly temperatures couldn't keep hardy Nome runners and bikers from participating in the Wyatt Earp Dexter Challenge, held last Saturday. The race took the 18 runners, eight men and 10 women, eight miles from Anvil City Square over the Dexter Pass to Dexter. The bikers, eight men and three women, also started from the heart of Nome, but took a different course, racing down Front Street, taking a left at the Beam Road and going to Dexter the long way, or 12 miles.

The fireweed in bloom alongside the roads and the bright gear worn by competitors were the only dots of color on this otherwise bleak and gray Saturday. But the weather didn't dampen the racer's and supporter's spirits.

First to cross the finish line was Benjamin Head on the bike, in a time of 41 minutes and 16 seconds. He went on to run uphill towards the Dexter pass to meet wife Amanda who competed in the runner's division. The first runner to finish was Levi Daugherty in a time of 51 minutes and 14 seconds. The first female runner was Crystal Tobuk, finishing the race in 56 minutes and 28 seconds. The first female biker was Jane Lando. A few bikers opted to use their snowbikes, wheeling their fat tires over the soft gravel roads in respectable times.

The CAMP Department of Norton Sound Health Corporation sponsored the race.

Tobuk brings marathon running to Nome

By Bob Lawrence, MD

Runners in the Norton Sound region will have the opportunity to participate in a full or half marathon this weekend, thanks to the efforts of one local running enthusiast.

Crystal Tobuk, the sponsor and organizer of the Cape Nome Half and Full Marathon, states this will be her first marathon. Tobuk says she decided to host a marathon because it is something she has always wanted to do, but as a mom and small business owner, she found it hard to travel out of Nome to run a marathon.

Tobuk believes hosting the marathon will be a good way to get people who do run to run farther and those who do not yet run to start run-

Many people have taken up the challenge to prepare for this event, and in doing so will join the hundreds of thousands of people who will run a marathon this year. Over the last decade the number of Americans who run a marathon or halfmarathon has risen from 299,000 a year to nearly 500,000 people per year nation-wide.

According to Tobuk, many people have expressed an interest in participating, and even more have volunteered to provide race support with water, sports drinks, and gel packs.

The marathon route stretches from East End Park in Nome to Cape Nome and back, a total of 26.2 miles. Half-marathoners will run from Cape Nome back to East End Park, a total of 13.1 miles.

Tobuk is a personal trainer. Though some trainers encourage running for a full year without injury before training for a marathon, Tobuk is less restrictive. "Once you can run three mile runs three times per week for three to four months, you are ready to train for a marathon.'

Runners may register for the Nome Marathon at www.aktrainer.com. The race is scheduled to begin at 10 a.m. on Saturday, August 4th.

Even if it is too late to compete in the marathon, runners have other opportunities to participate in races. Many communities in the Norton Sound region host races throughout the year appropriate for runners and athletes of all ages and experience levels. It is never too late to pick a race and begin training, even if the goal is simply finishing.

Some people are fearful that endurance sports will cause an injury. Knee pain, hip pain, ankle pain and plantar fasciitis are the most common injuries for distance runners.

The key to injury-free training is a gradual increase in distance over several months while paying attention to nutrition, footwear, and proper stretching. According to Tobuk, "It is so important to stretch after running."

Sports injuries are rarely debilitating. Most sports medicine doctors recognize that the health benefits of running far outweigh the risk of a joint or muscle injury. Most doctors would much prefer to have a patient call because he or she is having knee pain with running, than to get the call that a patient is having a pain in the chest resulting from an inactive

Endurance activity is known to improve brain function and may provide protection against Alzheimer's disease. Scientists have measured several chemicals released during exercise that have an effect on the brain similar to pain killers and antianxiety medications.

The feeling experienced when these chemicals are released is called "the runner's high." It explains why some people become dependent on running. But unlike harmful addictions that cause life to fall apart, endurance training supports good health and in many ways helps life come together.

Running may not be the ideal sport for everyone. But the body was meant to move. Activity of some form is an important part of being healthy. As Tobuk says, "Lift. Run. Play. Make the gym your playground."

Jerry Landgrebe

"Strength and courage aren't always measured in medals and victories. They are measured in the struggles they overcome.

The strongest people aren't always the people who win, but the people who don't give up.

Jerry Landgrebe

Jerry didn't give up but lost the battle with cancer on June 29, 2012 in Providence Hospital, Anchorage, Alaska.

Born March 1941 to Ruth (Bertch) and Arnold Landgrebe, he was the "#1 son" of four children. A free spirit and independent thinker, Jerry loved his 71 years to the fullest, the result of hard work and his zest for life and new adventure.

As a young man, Jerry worked at the Dakota Zoo in Bismarck, North Dakota where he helped to bring an Alaskan Kodiak cub to the zoo, which just may have planted to seed that got him to Alaska.

Pioneering in the '60s, Jerry worked in the Prudhoe Bay area and homesteaded while building a log cabin in the Brooks Range where he came to know and respect the Native people. Flying his cub over the beautiful landscape of Alaska only reinforced his admiration and commitment to the land.

Whether "Red" or one of the "Three Hairy Brothers," Jerry's integrity, work ethic and sense of humor gained him many loyal and trusted friends both in Nome and Fairbanks where he lived.

Mining gold from the bottom of the sea is a challenge, but Jerry was up to the challenge and so began the chapter of his life, one that resulted in a segment on the History Channel highlighting that adventure.

Jerry subscribed to the writing and teaching of Thomas Jefferson and admired the scientific minds, research and thinking of Jane Goodall, Carl Sagan and those writers found in the pages of Smithsonian and National Geographic. While in North Dakota earlier this year, Jerry developed a keen interest in the exploits of Lewis and Clark and spent time visiting points of interest and learning all he could about these early explor-

Albert Einstein said, "If something is in me which can be called religious, then it is the unbounded admiration for the structure of the world as our science can reveal it." That sums Jerry's belief. He asked that a friend scatter his ashes over the land. So when the aurora borealis dances on the horizon or wolves run wild with the caribou, let it be known that this special mountain is a better place because it cradles the remains of a true Alaskan pioneer who loved the land, its animals and her people.

Jerry is survived by two brothers, Lowell and Fred, a sister, Linda, and brother-in-law, Lannon, two nieces and nephews: Madeline, Mara, Magnus, Cordelia, Rocco and Deuce, whom he entrusted his estate to the "6 Pack Trust" in hopes of furthering their educations. This is Jerry's legacy to the future. He is also survived by true and good friends, cousins, aunts, uncles and an aunt, Esther, who has always held a special spot in Jerry's heart.

Public Safety has many facets and angles that have to be covered. The City of Nome is fortunate that not only does it have a dedicated group of public safety professionals to serve the community, but it also is a community that cares about the welfare of our people. But in order to promote a safe and secure community, we all must realize that public safety begins with individual safety and that your individual safety habits have a large impact on whether you or your loved ones become the victim of unfortunate circumstances.

Individual safety begins with making good

It's very easy to think that nothing bad will ever happen, but we can all decrease the risk of injury or victimization by making sound safety choices

And please report any suspicious situation to the Nome Police at 443-5262. Or if you have information about a crime, you can call us at 443-5262 or email us at nomepolice@hotmail.com

WINNER — Tammy Treend, 23, accompanied by Glenn Edwards on the guitar, gave the winning performance at the "Youth in the Spotlight" contest during the Summerfest, held on July 28 at the Rec Center.

Rain drives Summerfest inside

By Diana Haecker

Torrential rain poured down for the entire week, and the organizers of the Summerfest and talent competition had to resort to plan B, bringing the fest inside the Rec Center. The Summerfest is an annual affair to showcase Nome's talented teens and give them the opportunity to show their talents in front of a larger crowd.

The sponsors, 907 Network Services and Bush907.com, CHARR, the Nome Community Center, the City of Nome Parks and Recreation Department and the Youth Education Services Agency set up two bounce houses, had a dunk tank courtesy of Arctic Chiropractic, booths with Summerfest-themed Tundra T-shirts, CAMP's message of eating healthy fruit and vegetables, the Nome Rotarians selling bathtowels and hamburgers, as well as National Park Service employees doing face paintings. After a performance by the Usual Suspects, Nome rapper Halfsmoked aka Loren Sands and his wife, Lucille, with son Kasen Evans took to the stage.

Then it was time to put the Youth in the Spotlight, as the motto of this year's Summerfest was called, and the talent competition started. The contest was open for ages 12 through 24, and only three "groups" decided to perform. The winner was Tammy Treend, 23, accompanied on the guitar; second was a group of Summercise interns Molly Benrud, Olivia Myers, Hannah Cory, Kim Ayek and Callie Kettner, and third place went to Miranda Murphy.

NSEDC shares harvest bounty with member communities

Board doubles Community Benefit Share cap to $200,000 per village

By Laurie McNicholas

Flush with cash from large and lucrative Bering Sea pollock and crab harvests, Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. plans to share the bounty with its 15 member communities by giving each of them $200,000. Earlier this year the company distributed a Community Benefit Share of $100,000 to each community.

The NSEDC board of directors doubled the CBS cap to $200,000 and for the first time approved a midyear distribution at a meeting last week in Nome. The board stipulated that half the CBS distribution—$100,000—be used for youth activities. This is the first time the board has specified a use for CBS funds.

Following an executive session closed to the public, the board approved a motion for NSEDC to purchase all quota shares from the K.D.S. Corp. and sell a vessel named Patricia Lee to the Siu Alaska Corp., NSEDC's wholly owned for-profit subsidiary. The Nome Nugget reporter in attendance could not hear all of the words in the motion and asked Tyler Rhodes, NSEDC's communications director, to provide a written copy of the motion. Rhodes said he would consult and reply.

On Aug. 6, Rhodes wrote in an email to the Nugget: "This relates to a transaction which is currently in the negotiations stage. Due to this,

NSEDC cannot provide further comment at this time."

A video at the K.D.S. Corp. website provided the following information. K.D.S. Corp. is a family-owned Kodiak business that harvests just over 1 million pounds of golden king crab annually in the Aleutian Islands area. K.D.S. owns the F/V Patricia Lee, a 130-foot catcher-processor, and uses the vessel to harvest the quota with a nine-member crew. The catch is cooked, flash frozen, and packaged in 40-pound boxes aboard the Patricia Lee. The product is then transported to a cold storage location near the Port of Seattle. It is sold almost exclusively in the United States

Siu Alaska Corp. currently owns the 123-foot F/V Aleutian No. 1, which is used to harvest the company's quota of golden king crab and other crab species in the Aleutian Islands and Bering Sea.

NSEDC financial report

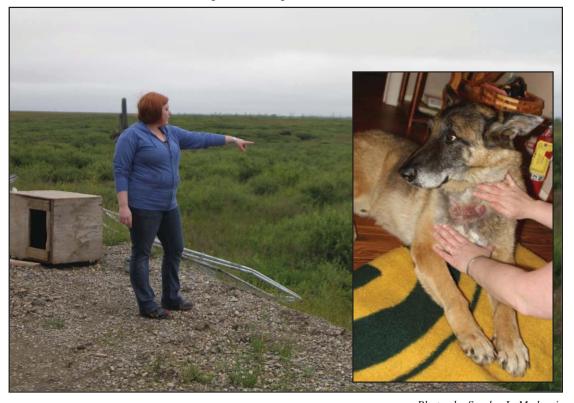

NSEDC's net assets totaled 164.1 million through June 30, a net gain of 11.2 million compared to net assets of $152.9 million on Dec. 31, 2011, reports Rick Walicki, the company's controller. Walicki emphasized that the figure is preliminary. Preliminary and final net asset figures can vary by millions of dollars. For example, at an NSEDC board meeting last February, Walicki reported a preliminary total of $155.6 in net assets on Dec. 31, 2011, an amount $2.7 million higher than the final figure of $152.9 million he provided last week.

Walicki said accounts payable totaled $10.1 million through June 30, compared to $4.7 million last year. He said this year's figure includes more accrued royalty revenues because the company's pollock share is larger and was harvested faster than last year. Accounts payable, including accrued expenses, total $8.7 million through June 30, Walicki added.

Walicki said NSEDC has received $2.5 million more in royalties

THIN LINE (top) — Sarah Swartz shows where a musk ox returned to the tundra after she shot it three times and injured it Saturday night after it attacked her dog. State Fish and Game staff recommends building sturdy fences to separate yards from musk ox habitat, which for now seems to be anywhere they want to go.

Musk ox bull gores pet

By Sandra L. Medearis

Good fences make good neighbors...-Robert Frost

There was a time not so long ago when one had to take visitors for a drive up Anvil Mountain to see some musk oxen and maybe—not always—get to see them off to the right side of the road. Then camera shutters would begin a frenzied staccato.

Now, musk oxen have claimed the tundra and town so that the land-scape around Nome is heavily populated with the short-legged, bushy-haired mammals. Many people do not slow their vehicles to gawk at the common sight.

As a result, two species, humans and muskoxen, want to occupy the same land with sometimes tragic or near tragic clashes. Many talk about solutions, but none have been reached. State Dept. of Fish and Game say for now, fences could separate the musk ox from domestic animals and children to minimize injuries stemming from the contest over habitat.

Another bloody incident Saturday night between a musk ox and a dog underlines the need for a lasting solution. As of now, there is little likelihood that musk oxen can graze peacefully among humans and their domestic animals without aggressive musk ox staking and defending territory from dogs, which resemble a musk ox's arch enemy, the wolf.

Saturday night, Sarah Swartz of Martinsonville Subdivision heard warning barks after she put her dogs out for the business before bedtime.

"I heard my little dog bark a warning. Then I heard my big dog, Cole, make a painful bark like he was hurt. When I went outside, there was a very large bull musk ox standing about 10 feet from where my dog should be," Swartz said Sunday. It looked like it was her height at the shoulders—big—she said.

A neighbor yelled across the way, saying she had seen the musk ox charge Swartz' dog.

"I couldn't see my dog anywhere," Swartz said.

"I ran back inside and grabbed the only rifle [a 0.17 caliber] that I knew had rounds in it. I shot three times at the musk ox. Meanwhile, my neighbor, Mary Ruud, called the cops," Swartz said. "The musk ox sauntered away into the high brush behind the house and disappeared."

Alaska ice seal UME investigation rules out bird flu

By Diana Haecker

Scientists investigating an unusual mortality event of harbor seals in New England identified a strain of the avian flu, influenza A H3N8, to have killed harbor seals in unusual numbers last year.

However, bird flu tests run on the carcasses of Alaskan ice seals, also subject to an unusual mortality event investigation, have come back negative

The National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration declared in both unexplained seal dieoff instances an unusual mortality event. In November 2011, a marine mammal UME was declared for Maine, New Hampshire and northern Massachusetts for a high number of seal deaths starting around September 2011. As of that time, 162 harbor seals were included in the UME, most under six months old. The Alaskan northern pinnipeds UME was declared in late December 2011 and was later extended to include walruses

Raphaela Stimmelmayr, research biologist and wildlife veterinarian with the North Slope Borough is the onsite coordinator of the UME on the Alaskan ice seals. She said that researchers involved in two UME investigations have worked closely together as some symptoms of the harbor seals and the ice seals looked similar, especially the skin lesions. But a closer, microscopic look revealed that the lesions were of different nature. The symptoms of the Alaskan ice seals suffering from the mystery disease included hair loss, weakness, unusual tame behavior and approachability, and skin sores.

According to a scientific paper releasing the findings about the New England UME, only a small number of harbor seals were fresh enough for a necropsy and in all five bodies, researchers found fragments of bird flu DNA. "Although the H3N8 subtype encompasses the virus responsible for canine and equine influenza, this seal virus is molecularly different from those viruses and appears more similar to wild bird influenzas and falls into a different lineage," a NOAA explanation reads.

To date, there has not been a single reported case of human infection with the flu strain H3N8.

In the case of the five seals that tested positive for this virus, they all had pneumonia, lesions on the skin and presumptive secondary bacterial infections. Stimmelmayr said that the ice seals tested negative. "We ruled out that the ice seal sickness is caused by the bird flu," Stimmelmayr said.

Another difference in the two seal mortality events is that the affected harbor seals were pups. In the ice

Letters

Letter to the editor,

At the Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation's (NSEDC) second-quarter board meetings in Nome on July 31, NSEDC was forced to have an individual removed who became disruptive after refusing to turn off an audio recording device at the meeting. Nome resident Tim Smith was given the option to remain at the July 31 meeting, but chose the path that led to his removal.

As a practice, NSEDC does not allow unauthorized recording devices to be used at its meetings. At the direction of NSEDC Board Chairman Dan Harrelson, NSEDC legal counsel Kyan Olanna informed Smith of his option to turn off the device or be asked to leave. After refusing to turn off the device and the subsequent request to leave, Smith became verbally abusive to committee members and disrupted the meeting proceedings. The disturbance occurred after Smith had already provided public comments during the allotted time.

NSEDC regrets being forced to take such a measure. It is a decision that is not taken lightly. However, Smith left NSEDC with no choice after refusing multiple requests. The Nome Police Department came at NSEDC's request to escort Smith from the meeting since he would not leave on his own accord.

NSEDC is a private nonprofit corporation that voluntarily keeps its meetings open to the public. There is no law requiring NSEDC to allow open access to its meetings. However, NSEDC values public input and transparency, and conducts the great majority of its committee and

Vote for the Coast

How could anyone be against Coastal Zone Management? Don't ya wonder who is paying for all those expensive TV ads urging Alaskans to vote against Coastal Zone Management? They scream the boogey man mantra of jobs and economy and claim Alaska already has the strongest environmental laws in the nation. This is just so much horse puckey it ought to make everyone in western Alaska standup and scream in righteous indignation.

Coastal Zone Management is about giving us a voice. It gives us a seat at the table where the folks with big industrial bucks, state and federal government are obliged to listen to the concerns of local citizens. Without a Coastal Zone Management Plan the moneyed individuals and big national and international corporations can move into our backyards and create an environmental wasteland without blinking an eye. We would have no say in the matter and the State wouldn't give a hoot.

We need to have a voice. We need to have a say in factors that shape our future and directly impact our quality of life. Without a Coastal Zone Management Plan we are at the mercy of corporate greed. One has to wonder why our legislature allowed the old Coastal Zone Management Plan to lapse. It seems like a systematic approach to pull the teeth of local control. It shuts us out. Why? We need to shape our future. We had a Coastal Zone Management Plan that was good and now we are the only state without one. Who benefits? We are the state with the deepest treasury of natural resources. We are easy pickings without a Coastal Zone Management Plan. On August 28 vote "yes" on ballot measure 2. Vote for the Coast. -N.L.M.-

In addition to generally not allowing recording devices in its meetings, NSEDC specifically limits communication with Smith since there is active litigation occurring between he and NSEDC. Smith is currently appealing his loss of a lawsuit he initiated against NSEDC in 2009.

While Smith will likely argue that NSEDC is actively working to suppress its critics, this is not the truth.

Smith has been freely allowed to criticize NSEDC's operations and programs during the public comments portions of its meetings for years. NSEDC, however, will not allow personal attacks and unfounded accusations against board members, staff or other members of the public to be aired as public comment at its meetings; nor will it allow disruptions and outbursts during board and committee deliberations. A member of the public who wishes to participate in NSEDC's meetings must abide by NSEDC's protocols, just as would be expected in any other forum.

NSEDC regrets that this isolated incident has taken the focus away from the important work NSEDC board members and staff conduct to deliver a vast array of benefits to the entire region.

Janis Ivanoff NSEDC President and CEO Dear Editor,

I'm beginning to understand the ramifications of having a Republican governor with no heart. I am a retired teacher and librarian, my husband is a retired corrections officer and we were residents of Alaska for 32 years. We have two children, (son 23, daughter,21) who were covered our state health insurance. Alaska's Gov. Parnell opted out of Obamacare which means now my children have no health insurance. My son needs his wisdom teeth pulled and we can't afford it. God help us if something really serious were to occur. How many other Alaskan families are affected by this type of shortsighted action? Please contact your representatives in the Alaska state legislature to remedy this.

A Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

In the spirit of the 1900 Nome Gold Rush, the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum is pleased to continue "The 1900 Diary of Wilfred A. McDaniel" in the next several issues of The Nome Nugget Newspa-

Wilfred McDaniel was 25 years old when he first landed at Nome in June 1900 in the midst of the largest gold rush in Alaska. Wilfred was a gifted photographer, writer, artist, poet and an amateur dentist. During the eight years he lived in Nome he lugged his 20 pound Kodak camera from town to beach claim through rugged creeks and mosquito infested tundra, during powerful Bering Sea storms and furious blizzards. All the while he wrote descriptive letters to his parents in California and maintained a diary covering almost every day he lived on the coast west of Nome.

In the last issue of the Nome Nugget Newspaper, the good weather had turned to had like it often does in late July. Now it's starting to turn "louse-y" as they

Tim Smith expelled from NSEDC meeting for recording committee session

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Nugget asked Nomeite Tim Smith and Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. to provide statements regarding an incident that occurred at a meeting of the NSEDC Fisheries Development Committee July 31 at the Bering Straits Native Corp. boardroom in Nome. The FDC is composed of several members of the NSEDC board of directors, including committee chairman Oscar Takak of Takak convened the meeting at 1:30 p.m. A few minutes later, Takak invited public comments per the meeting agenda and directed the public just to make comments, not to make an attempt at discussion.

Smith twice told Takak he didn't understand what he meant, and Takak repeated his direction to just make comments. Takak refused to answer a question from Smith. Smith said he thought the purpose of comment was public discussion.

Smith then presented comments to the committee. He said a red (sockeye) salmon run of 50,000 fish had been forecast at the NSEDC board meeting in April, but it may not be one tenth of that. People are suffering and nothing is being done about it, he added.

Smith noted that king salmon runs are starting to be poor throughout the state and have hit the road system. He said the ADF&G Commissioner Cora Campbell has said there is a need to look at hatchery production.

Smith referred to a weir that has been in place for 30 years, and a local hatchery that is not in use. Sockeyes and other salmon species are counted at the ADF&G Pilgrim River weir operated by NSEDC with assistance from ADF&G. Smith previously operated a hatchery at Hobson Creek near Nome. Smith said Charlie Lean, director of fisheries research and development for NSEDC doing research projects, not salmon enhancement.

Smith said the Unalakleet River king salmon runs are going down like Nome's chum salmon runs did 30 years ago. "If runs go too low, you can't get them back," Smith said. Smith commented that NSEDC has spent a lot of money on salmon operations. He said paying high prices for pink salmon means more losses for Norton Sound Seafood Products. NSSP is owned by NSEDC. Smith concluded by saying it is a very disappointing situation, and NSEDC is part of the problem, not part of the solution.

Takak then announced the next agenda item, a report by Jim Menard, the ADF&G area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue. Janis Ivanoff, NSEDC president and CEO interrupted to ask Takak to call a 10minute break, and he did so at 1:39

The Nugget reporter who attended the meeting remained in the room during the break, but noticed nothing unusual until NSEDC legal counsel Kyan Olanna approached Smith and spoke to him. The Nugget reporter heard Olanna say "warning" and "asked to leave" to Smith. Then Smith began to speak, and Olanna told him "to just back off", and she turned away from him. Smith made a comment that included the words silly, juvenile and childish. He said he has spent 20 years trying to get salmon enhancement, and NSEDC has blocked him at every stage. Smith asked board member William "Middy" Johnson of Unalakleet what he had done. In recent years king salmon runs to the Unalakleet River and its tributary, the North River have been so weak that commercial fishing is banned and subsistence and sport fishing are curtailed at times. Johnson said he has done a lot for his community.

Nome Police Officer Michael Yant entered the meeting room and asked to speak with Smith, and both left the room. Olanna also left the room. Takak reconvened the meeting at about 1:50 p.m. Olanna eventually returned to the meeting, but Smith did not.

The Nugget later asked Smith what issue had prompted Olanna's comments to him and Officer Yant's request to speak to him. Smith said Olanna had quietly asked him to turn off a recording device he had placed on the meeting table, and he had refused to do so. Smith said Yant ordered him not to return to the meeting. Smith said he asked Yant to provide the legal basis of his order. Smith said Yant phoned him a couple of hours later and told him Alaska Statute 42.20.301, titled "Eavesdropping," is the applicable law.

The Nugget requested a written statement about the incident from Smith. The Nugget asked NSEDC to provide a description of the issue that prompted NSEDC's action and the rationale for the action. The Nugget also asked whether the company has decided to bar Smith from future public sessions of board meetings or is contemplating such action.

Following are statements as provided in writing by Smith and his attorney, Kenneth Jacobus, and by

Statement by Tim Smith

"I went to the meeting thinking that things have finally gotten bad enough that the fisheries development committee might be willing to talk about doing something to restore our salmon runs. I should have known better.

"The governor has declared 2012

Yukon River king salmon returns a disaster. The Alaska Board of Fisheries has held two emergency meetings this summer to decide what to do about poor returns of Cook Inlet king and silver salmon.

The situation with some of the Norton Sound salmon stocks is much more severe than anywhere else in the state but nobody seems to be noticing. As of July 21, only 21 king salmon had been counted through the weir on the Pilgrim River. Last year it was 44 and in 2010 it was also 44. And those aren't the only runs with catastrophically low numbers. It is time to do something and the only thing left that we haven't tried is hatchery production. Even the Commissioner of Fish and Game has finally reached that conclusion and said so in the televised news conference with Governor Parnell, July 20.

We operate a proven salmon hatchery on the Nome River ready to produce salmon; in fact, it is the only hatchery on the Bering Sea coast. It is sitting empty now and NSEDC is the primary reason for that. I thought it was time to ask NSEDC to at least get out of the way and maybe even help. I knew it was a long shot.

"I have been going to NSEDC meetings for more than 20 years. In the past my comments have been consistently misunderstood or misrepresented in the minutes. This time I figured I would take my digital recorder along so that I at least had an accurate record of what was

"As anyone who attends public meeting can attest, many people make audio recordings of public meetings. It's easier than taking notes. NSEDC tape-records all of its meetings including this one.

'There is no law in Alaska prohibiting a person attending a public meeting from recording that meeting.

"NSEDC has never tried to stop anyone else from recording at one of

"When their lawyer told me I had to stop recording I was taken aback. I'm not even sure why she was at the meeting. Nobody on the Fisheries Development Committee said anything about it and it was their meet-

"When the Nome policeman showed up, I figured that he would tell NSEDC's lawyer that I had the right to do what I was doing but obviously, that is not what happened.

"It makes a person wonder what they are hiding. "To top it off, I heard from the people who attended the meeting that nothing was said about doing anything to restore salmon harvesting opportunity. I guess the plan is the same old, same old; keep local fishing closed and count 'em until they're gone. That doesn't seem like much of a plan to me."

Smith's attorney, Kenneth Jacobus, emailed the following statement to the Nugget on Aug. 6.

"It is my opinion that AS 42.20.310(a)(1) does not to apply to these proceedings. First, the act of eavesdropping, which is the title of the statute, is generally defined as 'secretly listening to the private conversations of others without their consent.' In this case, there was (1) no recording of private conversations, (2) the recording was of the proceedings at a public meeting, (3) the recording was not secret as the device was openly available and it was known that there was recording, and (4) there was consent for the recording from various parties. This position is also supported by Palmer v. State, 604 P.2d 1106 (Alaska 1979). I understand that NSEDC also records the meetings itself, so there continued on page 6 through June 30 versus last year due in part to a large, fast 2012 pollock harvest. He said an increase in the total allowable catch of opilio crab accounts for $900,000 of this year's higher royalties.

Walicki reported a $1 million overall gain in securities investment income through June 30. He said investment performance was strong in the first quarter, weak in the second At the end of 2011, NSEDC's securities investment portfolio totaled $71.7 million.

John Eckels, president of Siu Alaska Corp., said the Aleutian No. 1 had just left the shipyard to begin harvesting golden king crab on Aug. 15. He reported a profit of $240,000 through June 30 for subsidiary Dutch Harbor Acquisitions, which owns the Bering Star Fisheries processing plant at Dutch Harbor. He said that's a weight off his shoulders after 18 months of operation. The plant needed a lot of work after sitting idle for some time, he noted.

Eckels said the Pacific Star completed a 50-day charter contract on Aug. 9, and a contract extension of 30 days is possible, so this should be a break even year for the vessel.

Eckels said BSAI Partners LLC is the bright spot among Siu Alaska's subsidiaries. Expenses are under control and pricing is good, he added. He said 2011 was a good year for BSAI Partners, and this year may be even better. BSAI Partners is a ioint venture of Siu Alaska and Coastal Villages Pollock, a subsidiary of Coastal Villages Regional Fund. The partners acquired 2.9 percent of the annual total allowable catch of Bering Sea pollock, seven trawl vessels and one crab vessel from Wards Cove Packing Co. on Feb. 1, 2011.

Board approves proposals

The NSEDC board approved funding proposals to commit $200,000 in matching funds to Kawerak, Inc. to help launch a capital campaign for the Beringia Museum of Culture and Science.

Janis Ivanoff, NSEDC president and CEO, said the funds probably will not be needed until 2014 and can be built into the budget. She noted that Kawerak and the Bering Straits Native Corp. each will commit $200,000 in matching funds to the effort. The Nome Common Council recently adopted a resolution allowing Kawerak to participate in planning and using space in the Richard Foster Building, which will house Nome's new Carrie M. McLain mu-

• Donate NSEDC's Nome loader to the City of Teller to replace its only loader, lost in a July fire that also destroyed three buildings in the center of the village, and purchase a new and larger loader for use in Nome. NSEDC board member Joe Garnie of Teller said the city used the loader to haul honeybuckets and trash and clear snow from streets, among other tasks.

• Allocate $75,000 from the Community Energy Fund to the City of Shaktoolik to insulate the community's water storage tanks. NSEDC board member Eugene Asicksik of Shaktoolik said the project could save the city up to $22,000 annually to put to use for the community. The Village Safe Water Program, the Denali Commission and the Federal Emergency Management Agency are contributing funds to the project, he • Transfer one third of revenues available for investment to the NSEDC education fund.

Other meeting highlights

The NSEDC board approved 2012 member representative election forms that include a new drug test requirement for each prospective can-Member representative elections are scheduled in Elim, Nome, St. Michaeal, Savoonga and Teller on Oct. 2.

The board agreed to a request from Garnie to add one person from Brevig Mission and one from Teller to staff at the Pilgrim River weir project to improve understanding of the project among residents of the two communities. Sockeve (red) salmon and other salmon species are counted at the Pilgrim River weir operated by NSEDC with assistance from ADF&G. Janis Ivanoff said the request will be included in budget development at a board meeting scheduled to begin Dec. 3.

The State of Alaska has begun a 10-year review of Community Development Quota groups. NSEDC is one of six CDQ groups in western Alaska. Each CDQ is evaluating its performance and the benefits it has provided to member villages to determine whether is has met the goals of its community development plan. The NSEDC board held a decennial review workshop closed to the public on Aug. 2 in Nome.

After the musk ox parted the willows behind the house and made for the tundra, Swartz looked for her German shepherd, Cole. She found him under the deck, his chest bleeding from a wound where the musk ox had tried to drive in one of its curved horns.

"I was hysterical," Swartz said Sunday. "I have never been so scared in my life. It was like a horror movie."

Swartz told the police she had fired at and hit the musk ox.

"I will go to jail anytime for shooting to protecting my six-yearold stepdaughter, my family, my dog and my property," Swartz vowed.

The musk ox has not been found. Swartz said he had been injured.

"I'm sure I hit him with all three shots," she said. "The first shot, I hit him in the hind quarters, I saw him flinch. The second shot, I aimed at the shoulder and neck area, he flinched. The third shot I aimed right at the ear-eye and it shook his head," she said.

According to Swartz, the three police officers who responded—Short, Miller and Octuk—were sympathetic and helped her with her dog.

"They were great. They wanted to make sure my dog got care as soon as possible."

After she cleared with police, Swartz loaded up her dog in her vehicle, which Ruud drove to town where Nome's vet, Derrick Leedy and wife Martina waited. "I was too shook up to drive," Swartz said.

Cole is on the mend and expected to recover from a gash in his chest.

Sunday, as she pointed out the musk ox tracks by Cole's doghouse, she found his red dog tag in the dirt. She thinks it was torn off Cole's collar during the attack.

The Nome-Teller Highway runs by the front of the red two-story house. There are houses to either side. But in back, where Cole's doghouse stands, only a few feet of backyard separate the house from the tundra grazing territory.

"It's not the musk ox's fault," Swartz said. "I love musk ox. They are fascinating animals that give beauty, meat and qiviut for warm clothing, but something has to be done," she said.

"Fish and Game has to use their resources, or, if it is not their responsibility, to tell us where we can go to get help. I could have lost my dog, who is one of my family members," she said. "I want my dog to die of natural causes, because he lived a long good life, not because he was barking and trying to protect his family then was killed by a wild animal."

Indeed, musk ox have been a nuisance and a threat in town as their numbers grow and their fear of humans diminishes. State Dept. of Fish and Game staff say obvious solutions have been tried and do not work. The list of attacks or near attacks goes on:

• In June, a herd of muskoxen bedded down in Tom and Elsie Vaden's yard near the north end of Steadman.

• Earlier in June, Dr. Carolyn MacDougald's dog woke her early in the morning. When she went to the door, "I found myself staring into the eyes of an agitated musk ox right at the base of my front porch," she wrote on a community e-mail group. "Just want you to know that this bull is not worried about cornering chained dogs onto their porches in people's yards. There is the fact that our kids are also in the habit of being outside as well."

• In July, a musk ox went into Keith Conger's yard in Icyview, stomped around, but was interrupted when Conger went out to check on barking. "I caught it ramming the dog houses and was able to chase it away," he said. "Unlike last year, no dogs were hurt."

• At the end of last month, Marty Ruud, whose yard has been visited often by musk ox, put out a call for a paint-ball gun "that would be adequate for local residents to mark aggressive musk ox. Something that would leave a really big hard-tomiss mark on the musk ox that Fish and Game couldn't miss.' Last year, Nome veterinarian Derrick Leedy reported five incidents in a two-week period in October when at least five dogs had been gored and thrown in the air. "The injuries to dogs are extremely dangerous," he said, "with usually a least two large deep and penetrating long wounds that penetrate vital organs.

Fish and Game often comes under fire on the musk ox issue. Attempting to deal with musk ox has no obvious solutions, according to Tony Gorn, biologist. Fish and Game has tried and found dealing with the musk ox exceedingly trying. Gorn is called out of bed frequently to deal with ongoing musk ox conflicts. Nome Police put out musk ox alerts to keep residents in the know when musk oxen come close.

Driving the musk ox away from town, when possible, is a very short-lived answer. Game managers can move musk ox easily across a clearing. "On open terrain you can walk musk ox forever. However, once you get them to a ditch, creek bottom or a stand of willows, that's where they hunker down and will not move," Gorn said.

Fish and Game staff has experimented with means to dissuade musk ox from taking their appetites to town, according Gorn. Loud noises—firecrackers and bells—helicopters, rubber bullets, pickup trucks, even Taser shock guns do not have lasting effect, practical studies have shown. So far, the musk ox will be where they want to be.

"You drive them away, remove them, and the next day they will be right back where they were, even continued on page 6 farther in," Gorn said. "We move lots of musk ox. They come right back like the tide."

Problem is, Nome and the surrounding areas are very attractive to the vegetarian musk ox, with plentiful willows and sedge, good cover and no predators.

There was a time, in the 1990s and early 2000s, when Nome residents found musk ox attractive, Gorn said. People wanted no hunting near town, wanting to keep musk ox in the camera viewfinder for themselves, relatives and tourists.

"'We love our musk ox," they said.

"The community of Nome had a strong appreciation for wild life viewing, but attitudes change," Gorn observed. The original musk ox population in Alaska became extinct in the 1800s. An effort to reestablish the short, squat animals has been very successful, stemming from musk ox brought from Greenland in the 1930s.

Now musk ox have multiplied and worn out their welcome with many people, causing incidents that threaten domestic animals and young children. Fish and Game has increased musk ox hunting in the local area over the past couple years, but limited hunting arms to shot guns with slugs, bows an arrows and muzzle loaders to keep high-powered rifle shots from flying in populated areas.

Game managers continue to study solutions for aggressive musk oxen.

"As nuisance animals, the incidents we worry about fall into two classes: musk ox that do not let people get out of their cars or go in and out of their houses, or the terribly sad event where they kill dogs, or more seriously," said Gorn, "the musk ox that threaten airport and aviation safety where musk oxen on the runway could cause a catastrophic aircraft crash"

Gorn said the ADF&G had been working with airport safety personnel to get a fence around Nome Airport where willows and the Snake River nearby make an Edenic habitat. October is a crucial month for clearing and keeping musk ox marauders off runways in Alaska.

"In October, it is dark, and snow has not accumulated to chase the animals back into the hills," Gorn said. "They do not concern us as much in June and July when we have good, 24-hour daylight."

Serving the public interest as regards musk oxen is complex, Gorn said

"We deal with three stances on musk ox: people who want to kill every wild animal in town, people who say 'Don't touch them,' and those who want us to manage the animals very carefully so there will be more to hunt. Those three divergent viewpoints have to be balanced."

"If you have dogs or small children, and live in musk ox habitat, I urge the public to get chain-link fencing connected to the ground, around yards or for six by six dog enclosures." Gorn said. "Chain-link has been very effective with my yard where they have visited for the past four years."

"This is City land. There's property, there's people, there's land that we have to defend ourselves. Luckily

I wasn't afraid to shoot. Other people have been afraid to shoot because of Fish and Game," said Swartz.

THE NOME NUGGET

Incidents where people shoot musk ox to defend their property are between them and the state Dept. of Public Safety, Gorn said Monday.

Swartz said she did not want to get into a fight with Fish and Game, but "If another bull musk ox comes anywhere near that close to my home and my family again, I will not hesitate to fire as many rounds as it takes to put it down," Swartz said. "If need be, they can arrest me for it. In the end I will know what I did was the right thing, and I did the most I could to do within my power to protect my family, which aside from my fiancée and step-daughter, includes my dogs."

Alaska State Troopers have warned Swartz that according to law, she must harvest the meat from the musk ox she shot Saturday. So far, she has not found it.

should really be no objection. Recording a public meeting is simply an efficient and more accurate way of keeping notes of what took place for future reference. It also provides more accurate evidence of what took place, which is one reason that police officers often record their dealings with the public in the context of enforcement of laws.

"Accordingly, Mr. Smith's expulsion from the meeting should not have been done based on AS 42.20.310(a)(1).

"In addition, since the meeting was public, Mr. Smith should not have been excluded from the meetings by the police during the remainder of the week, especially if he would not have recorded anything. Also, I do not see any justification at all for banning him from attending any public meetings of NSEDC until some unspecified time in the future, and using the Nome police force to keep him out of the public meetings.

"I understand that the expulsion was solely based on AS 42.20.310(a)(1). I have not been cited to any other reason for which Mr. Smith was expelled on July 31, and prevented from returning. Accordingly, I cannot address any other potential applicable authority which would prevent Mr. Smith from attending and recording these public proceedings since none was provided."

Statement by NSEDC

"Following Tim Smith's public comments to the NSEDC Fisheries Development Committee (FDC) during the established public comment period, NSEDC Counsel Kyan Olanna approached Smith at the request of NSEDC Board Chairman Dan Harrelson and discreetly asked him to turn off a recording device he had placed on the table. Smith refused. Olanna informed Smith that refusal to turn off the device would result in him being asked to leave the meeting. Smith refused to do either. Olanna asked if she should call the police. Smith responded that she

"During a subsequent break in the meeting, Olanna informed Smith that the police were on their way to escort him from the meeting if he did not voluntarily leave. Smith then confronted board members until an officer of the Nome Police Department arrived and requested that Smith join him in the hallway.

"Smith left the boardroom at the officer's request. Smith continued to record while he interacted with the officer, who informed him that he was not allowed to keep the device running without the officer's consent. Smith eventually left the premises at the request of the officer. He was advised by NSEDC and the officer to not return for the rest of the week's meetings.

"NSEDC does not take such a step lightly and regrets that Smith's behavior requires NSEDC staff and board members to divert its focus from the business of serving its member communities. NSEDC stresses that Smith's removal from the meeting came as result of his refusal to stop recording and not for any criticism he may have leveled against NSEDC during his public comments.

"NSEDC values input from all its member community residents — critical or supportive — but cannot and will not accept disruptive, abusive and threatening behavior directed toward its board members, staff and public who attend NSEDC meetings and events. A member of the public who wishes to participate in NSEDC's meetings must abide by NSEDC's protocols, just as would be expected in any other forum.

"This is an isolated event regarding an individual who is currently engaged in litigation against NSEDC and has a history of seeking confrontation with the organization. NSEDC maintains its policy of keeping the great majority of its board and committee meetings open to the public.

At this point, NSEDC cannot say whether this courtesy will continue to be extended to Smith."

USCG declares vessel Rustler squeaky clean

By Sandra L. Medearis

A U.S. Coast Guard inspector has declared the tugboat Rustler no threat to the environment. Mike Benchoff, owner, has had the vessel tied up at the end of the east end of the south wall of the Small Boat Harbor more than a few minutes longer than desired by the City of Nome. Benchoff is under orders from the Nome Common Council to have the boat out of the harbor by Aug. 15 or be barred from using the Port of Nome—forever.

A yellow containment boom that did surround the vessel now lies in a heap on the shore. Following an inspection during the past week, Marine Science Technician 1st Class Frank Schiano gave the Rustler, seemingly the City, Port Commission and harbormaster's nemesis, a clean bill of health.

"The case is closed," Schiano said Monday. "He [Benchoff] has met an administrative order to empty the bilge. He has removed any pollution. There is no issue.

"There is no threat to the environment at this time," Schiano said.

Asked if the U.S. Coast Guard would continue to eye Benchoff's operation, Schiano responded, "We monitor the port. We do not pick people out. This case is closed.

The booms surrounded Benchoff's vessel because the Rustler rolled over in a storm that occurred last fall, releasing pollution that became embedded in ice, Schiano explained. That is no longer a threat. Schiano said.

Joy Baker, harbormaster, and the Nome Port Commission have given Benchoff, a gold miner, numerous deadlines within which to remove his vessel, termed a derelict, and held Benchoff accountable for oil slicks in the harbor, as well as being late to pay his fees and failing to obey Baker's direct orders, violations of the port tariff. One port employee kept a diary for a month this summer on Benchoff's comings and goings to his vessel and his work schedule on it. The diary said Benchoff's work area at his moorage was messy with tools left plugged in.

Benchoff has maintained that his treatment by Port of Nome differed from requirements for other users, a due process issue and a failure by the City administration to acknowledge the Alaska Constitution.

Since the ice went out, the City's derelict has been Benchoff's treasure. At midnight Monday, Benchoff, who works often at night on the Rustler project, had the boat's engine running—a smaller engine he put into the boat over the past month to replace the seven-ton engine he took

"I'm going to put it in gear," he said, after checking the lines to make sure it wouldn't go too far.

The boat moved forward a few feet, tightening its lines

"Did you see it lurch? Did you see it move?" he grinned at bystanders.

The Port of Nome tariff requires vessels to move out of the harbor and return under their own power once every 30 days to prove they are in running order.

In a local outreach program over the weekend, the Coast Guard offered free no-penalty safety inspections to gold dredge operators on their craft, continuing a campaign to acquaint offshore gold miners with safety regulations and sound environmental practices.

Dredge owners are overall doing a good job in their attention to preventing pollution and good safety practices, Schiano said.

"I've found everybody I've talked to proactive on preventive maintenance and safety procedures," he said Monday.

Schiano stressed the importance of reporting spills as soon as possible, both to gain assistance and to be looked upon in a kindly light by pollution prevention agencies.

"There is a big advantage to cleanup being done as soon as possible, as fewer issues arise later on," he seals, the disease affects all age groups.

So far, the UME investigation on the Alaskan ice seals still has yielded no conclusive results. The researchers have performed necropsies on 28 ringed, bearded, spotted and ribbon seals, and two walruses. Subsistence hunters from the North Slope and as far south as Yakutat have been part of the investigation by sending fresh carcasses of diseased animals to researchers and biologists

As nuclear outfall of Japan's Fukushima power plant after the March 2011 tsunami has been a concern, the seals were also tested for presence of radionuclides. According to Stimmelmayr, the results of these tests are currently run through complete quality control and assurance, and she expects final test results by September. Preliminary results release earlier this year said there were no apparent signs of radionuclides in the carcasses.

As for tests conducted on environmental contaminants such as PCBs and heavy metals, Stimmelmayr said that she expects those results in the fall.

The UME investigators are now evaluating reports and hunters' observations during the spring seal hunt. Although the final compilation of numbers and species distribution has not been completed yet, this year hunters reporter far fewer sightings of sick seals. Stimmelmayr said that preliminary examination of less than 10 submitted seals suggests that the majority constitutes most likely "old" cases or survivors, however, histopathological examinations are still pending. While final results of the spring hunt evaluation are not out until mid-August, Stimmelmayr said the fall hunt would give an additional clue whether or not the disease has been only a one-year occurrence. "For being confident that the disease has run its course, we need to wait for reports from fall hunting," Stimmelmayr said. Last year, it was in July and August when the most cases of sick seals were reported on the North Slope. Then came a flurry of reports in September and October from the Bering Sea villages. As for walruses, Stimmelmayr said, the decisive point will be mid to late August until September, when the animals may haul out at Point Lay and researchers would be able to get a good look at the conditions of walruses in relations to the disease. Recently, three orphaned walrus calves were rescued from the North Slope and, according to Stimmelmayr, none of them showed symptoms of the mysterious disease under investigation.

Stimmelmayr stressed that without the help of the hunters and observations from the coastal communities, the investigation would be in far worse shape. "Because of the strong collaboration with hunters and their efforts of sending in carcasses and communicating their observations to us, we have such a good understanding of this," Stimmelmayr said.

GLASS FRONT — An abundance of windows facing the south allow a maximum of sunlight to flood into the new Norton Sound Regional Hospital building.

ON THE JOB— Kumin Associates architect Jon Stolle, left, and Mahlum architect Duncan Davidson were part of the design team that developed the concept of the new hospital.

New Norton Sound Regional Hospital nears completion

Story and photos by Diana Haecker

On a drizzly and cool early August afternoon in 2008, Norton Sound Health Corporation board members, Denali Commission, Rasmuson Foundation and Indian Health Service officials dug golden shovels into the brand-new gravel pad, in a ground breaking ceremony for new state-of-the art regional hospital. Despite the weather, they were all smiles and NSHC chair Emily Hughes said it was a glorious moment for Nome and the region.

At the time, finances weren't quite yet figured out, but NSHC had purchased a 38.5 acre site north of the Nome Bypass Road, now Greg Kruschek Avenue, and had money to pay Q Trucking to put down a gravel pad. The rest fell into place with the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act that infused Indian Health Services money into building the new facility, pegged at an estimated total cost of $150 million.

Now, the new Norton Sound Regional Hospital is almost finished and promises to be a healing place with spectacular views.

A Denali Commission grant paid for the design, which was done by Kumin Associates, Inc. of Anchorage in association with Mahlum Architects of Seattle, Washington.

Standing in the yet to be finished entrance hall of the new hospital, two architects with the involved architecture firms reflected on how it all began.

In the summer of 2005, NSHC selected Kumin Associates and Mahlum Architects. Jon Stolle with Kumin Associates said that the endeavor started with a brainstorm, including all user groups and an intensive two-week tour of the region. "Team members visited all 15 communities of the region to get a deep understanding of the cultural values and what was important to users not only from Nome, but the other communities," Stolle said. "From there on we developed a concept plan that was on this same site, but further up the hill." The costs to locate the hospital up on Gold Hill were over budget and the architects went back to the drawing board to par down the expenses. They ended up bringing the hospital closer to the road and the cost down.

Stolle said that he Norton Sound Regional Hospital is really two buildings in one, as it houses a hospital and also has clinical component.

Architect Duncan Davidson with Mahlum Architects explained that the building is unusual as it's design is inverted from hospitals built in more temperate climates. "There are a number of things that make this building unique," Davidson said. "For one, we are building on permafrost and we have to do everything possible to keep the ground frozen and what that means is that we don't have a basement. In a conventional building this size you put a lot of infrastructure, big air handling, generators, mechanical equipment, storage facilities and laundry and such in the basement. In this project we inverted the formula and put all of that on the third floor," Davidson said. The hospital sits on pilings driven through the four-foot gravel pad, a four-inch insulation layer and a geo-tech fabric. Assistant project manager Marc Crichton explained that the piling is 40-foot deep and sits on bedrock. Thermo probes are next to the pilings to conduct warm air up and thus prevent permafrost from thawing.

The first impression one gets stepping into the new facility is one of openness and light. The south side of the building is constructed of triplepane glass windows, affording a spectacular view of Norton Sound, the ocean and town. Of course, the higher up in the building, the more breathtaking the view. Approaching the third floor on a recent tour of the building, "tour guide" and assistant project manager Marc Crichton said that an Elder commented on the view, inquiring if the seal-hunting public could come up to the roof for seal-spotting during hunting season.

The architects have chosen the glass front for a reason. Jon Stolle said that the building was designed to face Norton Sound and the city.

"The whole length of the building, all 550 feet, the whole southern wall was set up as public lobbies, gathering spaces and all the medical departments are arranged after that," added Davidson. "So when you come in and wait for your appointment, you can look to the Sound, the city, and the glass front lets in the low sun."

Stolle added, "We used the low sun angle as the organizing principle, to capture that precious sunlight in the winter." The architects said they designed the building with the thought in mind that it should serve as a warm and welcoming place for the entire community.

Everything under one roof

The 133,873 square foot facility will house the outpatient clinic with 28 examination rooms on the first floor. Crichton explained that the facility was planned to accommodate the needs of patients from outlying communities to get most things done in one visit. Diagnostic labs, dental labs, even a lab for eye glasses are now in-house so that patients from other communities don't have to travel multiple times to Nome. Also on the first floor are procedure rooms and an operating room, the Emergency Room area, the imagery dewith mammogram and CT scanner.

The second floor will house the CAMP office, WIC, EMS offices as well as dental exam rooms, audiology, eye care, a cafeteria, a meditation room, physical therapy offices and the inpatient wing. The inpatient area has 19 beds in 15 rooms, two delivery rooms and a nursery. The third floor houses administration offices, human resources, billing and records offices. Most of the building's mechanical workings are on the top floor, including boiler rooms, laundry facilities, and storage rooms. Each floor boasts two employee lounges, one in the east wing, one in the west wing.

The cafeteria on the second floor is hoped to draw not only patients and hospital workers, but also members of the community to come and enjoy a meal. Stolle said that it was a design goal that the cafeteria would become an amenity. "Actually this hospital was seen as an amenity for the whole city and region," Stolle said. Davidson said that the hospital has a real community component to it. "We realize that people come here from the villages and they have not seen each other for a period of time, so this round floor here [at the entrance] is conceived as a meeting place and a place where people hang out, wait for rides and get reacquainted," said Davidson.

Nearing the finish line

Art will also play a big role once the hospital is finished. Art coordinator Peggy Fagerstrom is tasked to select relevant art work from the region to be displayed at the hospital's seemingly endless wall space. Three commissioned pieces, by artists Sylvester Ayek, James Adcox and John Coyne.

The building is in the commissioning phase, Crichton explained. Electrical, heating and climate control units are tested to ensure that all works well together.

He said about 300 to 400 construction workers have worked at the building, the design team consisted of about 100 people and about 17 different contractors, as well as specialty consultants for electrical, lighting and even acoustical considerations. Privacy is a huge concern, Crichton explained, thus the walls need to be buffered so that no eavesdropping can take place. A milestone will be reached in October and November, when about 7,000 different pieces of medical equipment plus furniture would be moved in. A transition team is then taking hospital employees through exercises called "a day in the life". "We will start to bring groups of people in to begin to model what their functions are going to be so they can begin to understand how they fit in and how the facility changes what they do," said Crichton. "We will start moving in medical equipment and transition the other departments into the new building so that by December 8 everybody knows what their supposed to be doing, how they're supposed to be doing it and how the building is supposed to function inside."

VENTING— Assistant project manager Marc Crichton stands next to the piling that the hospital sits on. The device to the right is a thermo siphon designed to vent warm air and prevent thawing of the permafrost.

EXPLORATION - The drill platform vessel Polar Bear was docked at the Nome Harbor on August 6 due to rough seas.

THE DOCK WALK

By Diana Haecker

While the incessant rain of late July let up a little bit, inclement weather still kept many small dredges tied up in the Small Boat Harbor, at Belmont Point and the Snake River mouth. As barges try to dock to the barge ramp while a lot of little vessels are parked in the Snake River, it often takes a skillful dance to dock on

In the Nome Nugget's weekly column about the comings and goings at the Port of Nome and the small boat harbor, harbormaster Joy Baker summed up the past week saying, "It was a very, very busy week.

Fuel is making its way into Crowley and Nome Joint Utilities fuel tanks. Last week, two lighter barges transported fuel from the Vitus Marine fanker Moor to NIUS tanks. Another delivery to be made by Delta Western is pending.

Crowley had a 400-ft line-haul tanker parked at the causeway and one lighter barge was lightering fuel into their Crowley tanks in the har-

Two research vessels, the Westward Wind and the Norseman II. visited the causeway when they had to move off to anchor while barges discharged. The crew went back to finish their work onboard the vessels and then embarked on their way northward.

Baker noted that a small contingent of four boats associated with the Shell drilling fleet was passing Nome last week. Baker said that the Port of Nome has offered its services to the Shell fleet. Shell signaled that they would be interested in crew changes and maybe to re-supply in Nome. Shell, however, has not answered a Nome Nugget request for an update on the company's plans to drill this summer in the Chukchi and Beaufort Seas and its plans to use the Port of Nome

Two gravel barges came to Nome to pick up gravel for the lower Yukon village of Alakanuk and six landing craft made landfall to take on village

AuruMar, the South African offshore gold mining company that leased several big tracts from DNR, now have their exploration fleet complete with the 150-foot drill platform Polar Bear, and their exploration vessels Thunder and Quicksilver to conduct exploration work off Nome's shore.

As of Monday, August 6, there are 81 dredges with 30 support vessels and 21 fishing boats registered in the Port of Nome.

The cruiseship Hanseatic is scheduled to arrive in Nome on August 14 and although not tying up at the Port of Nome, the luxury liner The World will be outside of Nome around August 17-18. The World is a 644-foot long, 12-deck residential cruise ship owned by its residents. They live on board as the ship travels the globe. The ship has 165 apartments where owners and their guest

Fishing for sockeyes resumes on Pilgrim and Kuzitrin rivers

The Pilgrim River and Kuzitrin River reopened to net fishing Aug. 6 and will remain open until further notice, announced the Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game in a press release.

"Sockeye salmon escapement past the Pilgrim River weir has improved since the closure to net fishing two weeks ago," the ADF&G release said. "The escapment goal at Salmon Lake is 4,000 to 8,000 sockeye salmon observed by aerial survey, and is expected to be met."

'High water has affected almost all salmon escapement counting projects in Norton Sound the past week," the release continued. "At the Pilgrim River weir high water resulted in the weir being opened and fish passing upstream without being able to be counted for nearly two days. Likewise, at the other towers and weirs, there were some days where counting was not possible or there was difficulty identifying salmon by species. Therefore, all escapement counts should be considering minimum counts."

Following are highlights of a regional fisheries update provided Aug. 3 by Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game.

Through the morning of Aug. 3, permit holders in the Norton Sound commercial red king crab fishery had harvested 310,000 pounds of this year's 465,450- pound quota.

The Norton Sound commercial salmon harvest to date by 91 permit holders is 200,000 pinks, 58,000 chums, 90 sockeyes and 9,600 silvers. The pink salmon harvest is the best since 1998, and the chum harvest is third best in the last 20 years.

Kotzebue fishermen had one of their greatest fishing periods in the history of the fishery on Aug. 2 when 54 permit holders caught 32,689 chum salmon during the eight-hour opening. There hasn't been a catch of more than 19,000 chum salmon in a fishing period in nearly 20 years, and the catch on Aug. 2 was the largest in a single fishing period since the 1980s, but they were fishing 24-hour periods back then.

Controlled chaos was a description of the dock in Kotzebue Aug. 2 with the buyer telling fishermen to pull their nets in a radio announcement at approximately 10 p.m., two hours before the scheduled closure. Fishing crews were too busy working their nets to even hear the announcement, or perhaps some didn't want to hear the announcement. The crew at Great Pacific Seafoods did a heroic job. The buyer was able to charter a Herc to make three round trips from Anchorage Aug. 3 to get the fish to the processing line. Great Pacific will notify ADF&G when they are ready to buy fish again, as their crew takes a well-deserved rest.

On Aug. 6, Menard reported the following salmon escapement counts in Norton Sound. North River: 960 kings, 7,000 chums, 140,000 pinks, 1,600 silvers. Unalakleet River: 740 kings, 64,000 chums, 680,000 pinks, 5,800 silvers. Shaktoolik River: 1,000 kings, 40,000 chums, 427,000 pinks, 2.600 silvers. Inglutalik River: 1,100 kings, 32,000 chums, 85,000 pinks, 500 silvers. Kwiniuk River: 5,500 chums, 380,000 pinks, 230 silvers. Niukluk River: 18,000 chums, 235,000 pinks, 100 silvers. Nome River: 1,500 chums, 105,000 pinks, 100 silvers . Pilgrim River: 16,000 chums, 45,000 pinks, 6,200 sock-

Coast Guard offered safety inspections to Nome gold dredge operators

Coast Guard inspectors finished up a weekend of what they called "non-punitive voluntary gold dredge safety examinations" in Nome on Monday.

Two Coast Guard inspectors, one from sector Anchorage and one from the 17th district offices in Juneau, provided the free safety exams as a culmination to their efforts to increase water safety awareness amongst the more than 80 registered

Which caffeinated beverages are good for you?

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Most people know that drinks with caffeine provide a temporary boost in mental acuity and energy.

Experts recommend a limit of 500 mg of caffeine daily for adults. The American Academy of Pediatrics says teenagers should drink no more than 100 mg of caffeine daily.

People who exceed these limits may suffer from headaches, restlessness, anxiety or insomnia.

In general one 8 oz cup of tea has around 50 mg of caffeine. The same amount of coffee has twice the caffeine, averaging 100 mg per cup. Caffeinated sodas have 35-50 mg per 8 oz can. Energy drinks (like Red Bull, Monster, or Full Throttle) have 70-80 mg per 8 ounces.

Though 500 mg of caffeine daily is the upper limit, this does not mean that drinking 500 mg of caffeine from all types of beverages is healthy. A person consuming ten cans of soda pop would be getting 500 mg of caffeine, but this means he or she would also be consuming almost a pound of sugar daily.

Research shows that caffeinated drinks like coffee and tea may have long-term health benefits. For example, coffee and tea may reduce a person's risk of Parkinson's disease, liver cancer, prostate cancer, colon cancer and dental cavities. Sometimes caffeine is used to treat migraine headaches and even asthma.

Coffee may also help prevent Type II Diabetes Mellitus. According to a Harvard study published in the Annals of Internal Medicine in 2004, men who drink at least four cups of coffee (36 ounces) per day reduce their risk of type II diabetes by over 50 percent, and women who drink at least four cups a day lower their risk by nearly 30 percent. Decaffeinated coffee has beneficial effects as well, but the effect is much less profound compared to caffeinated coffee.

Drinking soda may increase a person's risk of diabetes mellitus, osteoporosis, and non-alcoholic fatty liver disease. Unlike coffee and tea, drinking soda pop is not considered a healthy option.

Doctors are reluctant to recommend daily consumption of caffeinated beverages, especially at higher doses, out of concern for the harmful effects of caffeinated beverages. Coffee, tea and soda can exacerbate symptoms of gastritis or gastric ulcers especially in smokers.

The effect of caffeinated beverages on the cardiovascular system is mixed. Coffee causes a small elevation in cholesterol levels. The caffeine in coffee and tea can strain an unhealthy heart by temporarily increasing the heart rate and blood pressure. These harmful effects are balanced by the positive effects of heart-healthy antioxidants, which are highly concentrated in coffee and tea.

According to research published in the journal Circulation early in 2009, coffee consumption is associated with a lower risk of stroke in otherwise healthy individuals. The American Heart Association has found no clear adverse effects to moderate coffee consumption defined as one to two cups per day.

It is important to point out that the healthy aspects of coffee and tea do not overcome the unhealthy amounts of sugar and saturated fats added to many specialty drinks. Saying that coffee makes a double tall mocha healthy would be like saying that apples make apple pie good for you. In both cases any health benefits are purely social.

Taking your coffee black and your tea plain may sound old-fashioned, but when consumed daily, drinking your coffee and tea plain or adding only a little milk likely offers the greatest benefit to your health. Of course you can still have fun with the order. Enjoy a "single tall skinny drip without the whip" and be well.

gold dredge operators in Nome.

With the Coast Guard concern for safety came to a height after a dredge diver died in 2011. Since the tragedy, Coast Guard officials ramped up their outreach efforts to the owners and operators of offshore gold dredges and community officials of Nome.

"A modern day gold rush is underway in Nome with a boom in the numbers of off shore gold dredges being operated here," said Lt. William Albright, Sector Anchorage Investigations Division chief. "With the explosion of interest and the resulting numbers of vessels, we are dedicated to ensuring water safety of all mariners in Nome."

The Coast Guard has no permanent presence in Nome.

The free safety exams included making sure that all required safety gear such as lifejackets, flares and fire extinguishers are readily available and in good working order. If an owner or operator was missing any required equipment, they were encouraged to fix the situation and reschedule an exam.

Upon successful completion of the dredge exam, the vessels now sport an identification sticker to show that the dredge had been inspected and had passed the voluntary

Our brother, Conrad Klemzak, came into the world in 1957, the same year the Soviet Sputnik was launched. While Conrad didn't travel with the same speed as the Sputnik, he covered a lot of ground in his life. Conrad was a quiet, creative force and happiest when he was in a workshop surrounded by tools, ivory, wood and stone, or hiking in the San Gabriel Mountains near Los Angeles where he grew up. Most recently he worked in Nome beach mining for gold and commercial fishing. He was a good hand on deck and even better at shoveling gold-laden sand into his sluice box. He loved science and inventions and could repair most any mechanical contraption.

Saying It Sincerely

"Who is My Neighbor"

By Rev. David Elmore Executive Director, Nome Community Center

Reference: Luke 10: 25 - 37 As Executive Director of the Nome Community Center, I've seen a troubling trend within our community. It's what I call "us and them thinking." This means that we see ourselves as the "us" and those who are unlike us as the "them". What has been troubling me lately is the view of those who are long time residents of Nome as "us" and the new arrivals in Nome, especially the miners, as them. And so whether it be at the XYZ Senior Center or the Nome Food Bank or many other places in town, we, the us, sometimes want to distance ourselves from the "them" either because we view them as an inconvenience, believe the them damage our environment, siphoning off vital services from Nomeites, or maybe because we believe for some reason that they make Nome a less desirable place to live.

However, this sort of thinking is contrary to the Gospel. In Luke 10, the story commonly called the Rich Young Ruler, when Christ asked what was necessary for eternal life, he answered "You must love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your being, with all your strength, and with all your mind, and love your neighbor as yourself." (Luke 10:27, CEB) Jesus responded that he had answered correctly. This means that Jesus is saying that loving our neighbor is as important as loving God if we are going to live as God created us to live. Now the ruler, much like us, begins looking for a loophole. He asks who is our neighbor? Is the person here looking for rare birds our neighbor? Is the person who spends the winters somewhere warm and comes up to mine our gold our neighbor? Jesus, as he so often does, answers with a parable - the Good Samaritan.

We all know the moral of the Good Samaritan - the neighbor is not necessarily the one of our race, or the one of from our hometown. The neighbor is the one who acts like a neighbor.

In other words, our neighbors can be anyone. We can't draw generalizations about any sort of people. We never know who will come to our defense in our time of need. It may not be the person we most expect. It may be the person we least expect. And all the while we should remember, as ethicist Stanley Haurewas maintains, we are resident aliens in a foreign world, and it is our Christian obligation to show hospitality to those aliens among us in the city of Nome.

This week's media release emphasizes a serious issue: Many people in the area are being stopped for equipment and moving violations. Though it is good to see our officers out enforcing the laws that keep us all safe, voluntary compliance from the motoring public is the surest way to promote safety.

During the past week, several people have been stopped for going more than 20 miles an hour over the posted speed limit. Though it is easy to think that nothing will ever happen, a small miscalculation at these speeds may cause

Salmon Lake Campground

The BLM proposes to construct a new handicap-accessible toilet facility at Salmon Lake Campground, 40 miles north of Nome. The existing toilet facility no longer functions effectively and is not accessible for people with disabilities. Construction would occur during summer 2013. The campground, boat launch and existing toilet would remain open during construction.

A detailed project description and Environmental Assessment is available for public review at www.blm.gov/ak/afo/nepa. The BLM will accept comments on the proposed project until August 23, 2012.

of unsate driving can be severe.

In addition, there has been a number of ATV's that have been stopped for traveling on roadways, carrying passengers, and of which the passengers are either very young or in danger of falling off the machines. Though common sense would dictate that this is blatantly unsafe, officers are stopping members of the public to bring this to their atten-

Traffic events are a significant cause of injury and death not only in the State of Alaska, but in our community as well. Your police officers are equipped with the training and equipment to enforce the laws designed for safe operation, but your officers can't be all places at all times. As the new school year approaches, you can count on your police officers being visible and vigilant to promote safety. We will use our training, RADAR instruments, and observations to identify and stop those who are violating the law. A positive way of avoiding these contacts is to insure that you

Celebration draws regional culture bearers to Golovin

Photos and story by Rachel D. Lincoln

Raffle tickets were abundant and the dancers aplenty at the Golovin Cultural Celebration this year. Speakers and prominent attendees included Irene Navarro, Florence Doyle, Maria Dexter, Etta Tall, Robin Hughes, Bernadette Alvanna-Stimple, Eva Menadelook, Mary Jane Litchard, and Alaska State Senator Dr. Donald Olson.

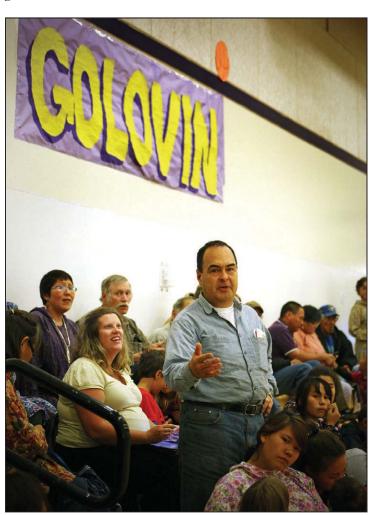

This year's festival coordinator and emcee Debbie Anungazuk credited her husband, Toby Anungazuk Jr., with starting the Golovin Cultural Celebration. She thanked Janet Amaktoolik, for first bringing Eskimo dances to Golovin after learning them at Raw Hide summer

The Kitchavik Dancers performed numerous traditional dances such as the "Friendship Dance" to the beat of the Golovin drums. Tall and Menadelook invited the children from the audience to learn and join in the dancing. Elders enjoyed sharing stories of their childhood. Dexter, Tall, and Måenadelook presented various regional plants and their nutritional values to festival attendees Sunday afternoon.

Beluga muktuk and blueberry ice cream were just a few of the homemade traditional dishes brought to the potluck during the weekend. Winners of the raffle received prizes such as t-shirts, games, movies, jewelry, and restaurant gift certificates.

This year's celebration was smaller than in previous years due to lack of funding, but Anungazuk insisted on keeping the annual festival going. "Even if it's just Golovin kids we're going to make it happen for them because of their love for dancing," she said. Anungazuk hopes for more community involvement in the future to make the festival happen more often.

Anungazuk's dream is for their community to come up with enough funding throughout the year to have a paid dance coordinator meet with students weekly and to make their dance group well-known throughout the region.

"We'd like to thank all of the guests and businesses who donated gifts," Anungazuk said.

Council supports NJUS alternative energy project

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council voted Monday night to approve the power utility's purchase agreement for two 900-kilowatt wind-driven generators to go on Banner Ridge.

Work will start as early as this fall to construct a foundation for the turbines with erection of the towers to start next summer after the towers and rotors arrive on the first barge.

Nome Joint Utility System staff expects the giant turbines at the top of their 164-foot towers to start twirling next June at a cost of $3.6 million for the machines and a total package cost of $9.069 million for construction and system integration activities.

The utility is currently discussing and negotiating placement on the peak with Bering Straits Development Corp., a partnership of Sitnasuak Native Corp. and Bering Straits Native Corp., proprietors of the already existing Banner Wind Farm LLC.

The Council also went along with

NJUS's plan to add $1 million from the NSEDC Community Energy Fund to the $8.069 million already secured in state grants from Alaska Energy Authority's Rural Energy Fund.

According to John K. Handeland, utility manager, the turbines could save as much as 250,000 to 450,000 gallons of fuel annually.

"The savings depends on the cost of energy," he said. "We are hedging our bets on the price of oil. We project the cost of a kilowatt to go down by 3 cents to 4 cents through reduction of the fuel surcharge."

cents, that could be a savings to residential consumers of around $336 per year.

Councilman Jerald Brown, employed by Bering Straits Native Corp., declared himself ineligible to vote as he had a conflict of interest. The remainder of the council members present voted unanimously to support NJUS decision to buy the turbines from EWT, a Dutch Company with offices in Minnesota. EWT will construct the turbines in the Netherlands.

Additionally, the Council approved a maintenance and service agreement with EWT. According to contract, after a 90-day adjustment period, the turbines will be available and ready to go with the wind 95 percent of the time.

Should availability fall below 95 percent, EWT will compensate the NJUS, but if availability would exceed 95 percent, EWT would share in the rewards with NJUS.

The turbines will share a stash of replacement parts that cannot be used anywhere else without NJUS permission, although Handeland said the utility would be willing to work with Kotzebue where the windmills are already in operation.

Snake River bridge replacement progresses on ambitious schedule

By Diana Haecker

The Dept. of Transportation's Snake River bridge replacement is underway and Pro-West Contractors LLC out of Wasilla are working at a good clip to drive the project ahead. The sight of the construction site changes daily, if not by the hour.

Construction started a few weeks ago, but the most noticeable changes occurred last week. Within a few days, half of the width of the Snake River south of Center Creek Road was filled with rock. Heavy equipment began hauling in armor rock to create a temporary platform to provide access for pile driving equipment. DOT engineer Tony Cox said that the armor rock platform would be removed when the bridge piles are in. Pro-West Contractors coowner Bob Gilman added that the temporary construction causeway would have to be constructed again next summer to set the girders.

The armor rock was barged in by a Pro-West barge from Unalaska. Gilman explained that it was a decision of economics to bring in armor rock as opposed to using local rock from Cape Nome.

The temporary "causeway" has two fingers, where bridge pilings will be driven into the Snake River.

There are going to be two piers in the river, with four piles total driven through the bedrock and ten feet deeper. On either side of the shoreline, there will be a row of piles to support the bridge. A specialist drill rig already began pounding in the Hpiles 70 feet deep at Jafet Drive and will continue driving in the piling in the river next week. "The pile driving and drilling is a fairly complex affair that required to bring in specialized equipment," said Gilman. The bridge will be eight feet taller than the roads as they are constructed now. As pile driving goes on from 8 a.m. through 8 p.m., Stampede trucks have begun to haul gravel to build the new alignment of Seppala Drive, filling the natural depression between the existing road and cemetery hill. Seppala Drive will be widened and is going to receive an eight-foot shoulder, but no bike or ATV paths have been planned.

Gilman said the goal for this year's construction season is to have all the piling in and to have the concrete pile caps in place.

Another goal is to finish the concrete abutment where the bridge meets Jafet Drive, the connecting road between the bridge and Port Road. Finally, Pro-West plans to construct the sub-surface for Jafet Drive this season. "We let the embankment and gravel settle over winter, it makes for a better surface," Gilman said. Next year, the plan is to set the large 106-foot long and 140,000-pounds (each) girders that span the length from the abutments to the pilings and then onto the abutment of the opposite side. It is still up in the air, whether work at rerouting Seppala Drive will be started this year. "This decision will be made in the next couple of weeks," Gilman

Tony Cox added that underwater sound monitoring equipment was brought in to protect fish by monitoring the sound levels while the pile-driving is underway.

Gilman said that Pro-West plans to work on the bridge until October 1 and to wrap up the earthwork on Jafet Drive and Seppala Drive by October 15.

bridge, a dozer mishap caused a phone outage for the better part of Thursday, August 9. On the northeast side of Seppala, workers with Pro-West Contractors, the company that landed the contract to replace the Snake River bridge, moved earth alongside Seppala with a dozer, struck the main cable that carries phone lines to west Nome and drug it along until it ripped. According to Dept. of Transportation engineer Tony Cox the buried cable was identified in plans supplied to the contractor.

The contractor declined to comment on the incident.

The outage was called in at 10:30 a.m. at TelAlaska, the main phone line carrier in town. TelAlaska spokeswoman Celine Kaplan said that approximately 30 customers and businesses and 180 active phone lines were affected. TelAlaska sent two technicians out to reconnect and splice the lines, a job that took them the better part of the day and the night.

Affected was the United States Postal Annex, the airport, FAA housing, cell phone service as GCI satellites are located at Port Road, even credit card machines. Hanson's couldn't process debit cards, only

To the Editor,

NSEDC has a documented history of defamation so last week's letter to the editor by Janis Ivanoff is at least consistent. The dictionary says that defamation means a false accusation of an offense or a malicious misrepresentation of someone's words or

Anyone who wants to know what really happened at the meeting Janis wrote about in her letter can listen to the audio recording on YouTube at http://youtu.be/dDETOB8DgZg

You will find that the facts are a lot different than what Janis said. If you listen to the portion beginning at 22 minutes, I ask the Nome policeman if recording is the only issue. He answers, "That appears to be the one issue."

Between the time of the meeting on July 31 and the deadline for submitting letters to The Nome Nugget, Janis Ivanoff changed her story. According to Janis, the reasons for calling the police were a lot different than what she told the policeman who responded.

In her letter, Janis says, "NSEDC was forced to have an individual removed who became disruptive after refusing to turn off an audio recording device at the meeting."

'Smith became verbally abusive to committee members and disrupted the meeting proceedings. The disturbance occurred after Smith had already provided public comments during the allotted time.

"NSEDC, however, will not allow personal attacks and unfounded accusations against board members, staff or other members of the public to be aired as public comment at its meetings; nor will it allow disruptions and outbursts during board and committee deliberations.

As you will see if you listen to the recording, none of the things Janis accused me of doing actually happened. One of the worst things about defaming someone is that it's easy for people who do it habitually to forget what they said previously.

Janis says, "While Smith will likely argue that NSEDC is actively working to suppress its critics, this is

Road to Special Interest

The State of Alaska's Roads to Resources project wants to shell out a half billion bucks to build a road to Ambler. This road will allow a private for-profit mining company to haul minerals out of Ambler. Where is the outrage? Of course the Republicans are known for their respect for capitalism and their Tea Party wing just loves to hate government and they want nothing to do with spending money for anything. What's wrong with this picture?

Isn't it a bit hypocritical to use public money to support private industry? A half billion bucks to build a road that will only support private mining interests! If the Ambler mining project is economically feasible why is the State bending over backwards to pave the way for private industry with big public bucks? All those Republican Tea Party folks who love to hate government need to let industry take the risks. Public money should not be used to support private enterprise.

Let's put an end to the hypocrisy. Look at what happened in Nome when the State built a fancy road to the Rock Creek Mine. What do we have but a road to a defunct mine! What a waste of public money. So folks, let's demand a stop to the abuse of public money. Let the mines build their own roads. - N.L.M.-

not the truth." Actually, that is exactly what NSEDC is doing. What was unexpected is that NSEDC's lawyer tricked a Nome policeman into enforcing a nonexistent law.

The freedom to speak publicly without fear of retaliation is one of the things that sets America apart from many of the countries in the third-world. It is no accident that freedom of speech comes first in the bill of rights in the U.S. Constitution. What NSEDC is doing is wrong and a violation of civil rights.

Voters in the August 28th election are encouraged to utilize the Touch Screen Voting Machine instead of a paper ballot. Every precinct, including "early voting", has one. While helpful for those who have trouble filling out paper ballots, e.g., those with physical or medical problems, the devices are definitely available to anyone who asks, says Gail Fenumiai, State of Alaska Director of Elections.

Advantages: If a voter misses selecting a candidate, or overlooks voting on an issue, the Touch Screen will ask "Did you intend to not vote here?" then give you the option to go back and do so. With a paper ballot, that omission will simply become a Nonvote. Before you hit Submit, Touch Screen will display all of your choices, allowing you to change your mind. A paper-trail is created; you'll see it being printed. Bonus: if your precinct runs out of paper ballots (witness the mess in Anchorage last spring) voters can continue by using the Touch Screen.

For those who hesitate because "they can be hacked and my vote changed." Won't happen. Touch Screens have been around for years and no "hacking" has ever occurred. Remember the same argument when we switched from hand-counting ballots to the current paper readers? Has reader-machine fraud occurred? Nope, not once.

Touch Screens are easy and fun to use. Try it! Steven Williams, 2231 Foxhall Drive

NOME'S "FRITZ" BRIDGES GENERATIONS - Seeking a respite from Nome's recent torrential rains, Harry and his father, Alvin Ivanoff Sr. of Unalakleet spent some time discovering their family history at the Carrie M. Alvin Sr.'s third cousin was Henry Ivanoff, who handed off the diphtheria medicine to Leonhard Seppala during the 1925 Serum Run. No doubt Seppala's leader, "Fritz" brushed up against Henry back then!

A Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Čarrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

In the spirit of the 1900 Nome Gold Rush, the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum has been pleased to present "The 1900 Diary of Wilfred A. McDaniel" which began its run in The Nome Nugget Newspaper back in early June. There are just a few weeks left in the diary.

Wilfred McDaniel was 25 years old when he first landed at Nome in June 1900 in the midst of the largest gold rush in Alaska. Wilfred was a gifted photographer, writer, artist, poet and an amateur dentist. During the eight years he lived in Nome he lugged his 20 pound Kodak camera from town to beach claim through rugged creeks and mosquito infested tundra, during powerful Bering Sea storms and furious blizzards. All the while he wrote descriptive letters to his parents in California and maintained a diary covering almost every day he lived on the coast west of Nome.

Thanks is due to volunteer Betty Davenport and former staffers Meghan Ten Eyck and Beverly Gelzer who painstakingly transcribed and proofed the original hand written journal kept in Wilfred's pocket throughout the summer of

Wind will turn on the lights in 2013

By Sandra L. Medearis

It is surer than tea leaves today that Nomeites taking a gander up Banner Ridge will see two giant 900-kilowatt wind turbines all atwirl next summer.

After years of wind studies and conferencing among utility staff, the City's attorney and a Dutch company EWT that builds the windmills, the NJUS board approved a resolution to go ahead with the plan for alternative power generation. That resolution went on to the Nome Common Council and achieved ap-

The 164-foot wind-driven generators could save the Nome Joint Utility System anywhere from 250,000 to 450,000 gallons of fuel in power generation annually, according to John K. Handeland, utility manager.

The tab for tapping wind energy currently totes up to $9.069 million.

The lion's share, $8.069 will come from state grants, already approved, from Alaska Energy Authority's Rural Energy Fund. The Nome Joint Utility System directors Monday noon also approved a resolution urging the Nome Common Council to OK a project budget that spends the $1 million in its Community Energy Fund. The CEF has been available since Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. set aside a million dollars for each village, benefactor of the regional Community Development Quota proceeds from the Western Alaska fishing industry.

The NSEDC money will cover the City's match for the state money and provide a contingency fund that includes the possibility that one of NJUS's existing generators may need to be relocated.

All in all, the rough budget divides the $9.069 million into the folpots: preconstruction activities including foundation design, system integration design, permitting and geotechnical studies, $341,500; construction activities including buying the turbines, building the foundation and freight, $6.7 million; integrating the wind-produced power into the existing grid, including switchgear and communication upgrades, system integration, secondary load equipment and changes on the existing power distribution system; $1,212,500. The contingency fund of $815,000 contains the City's match for $8.069 million in grant money.

Although EWT will continue to monitor the turbines, NJUS employees will control the integration with the existing power grid.

NJUS is buying a five-year service and maintenance agreement that will cost $76,000 the initial year and be subject to inflation indexing the remaining years. During the term of the agreement, EWT will be responsible for all major and minor maintenance, servicing, and providing parts for maintenance activities. NJUS will shadow EWT personnel during maintenance to increase their familiarity with maintenance of the turbines.

Following a breaking in period for tweaking and adjustment, there will be warranted technical availability of 95 percent. If the units fall below the 95 percent, EWT will provide an equalization payment to NJUS to compensate for the down

However, if the turbine units perform better than 95 percent, NJUS will provide a benefit sharing payment to EWT as incentive to keep the units in high availability.

EWT will begin to construct Nome's wind turbines in the Netherlands this month with delivery to the Seattle docks in April. They will leave for Nome on Northland Services' first sailing north leaving Seattle in May. STG, a heavy industry contractor from Anchorage, will erect the EWT 900-kw turbines with rotors 168 feet in diameter.

STARTING A TREND?—Employee Miles Reader lowers the gas price sign at Crowley Petroleum pumps near Alaska Commercial Co. last week. Gasoline at Crowley went down from $5.99 to $5.92. Ultra Low Sulfur Diesel at the pump dropped from $6.26 to $6.17 per gallon. Bonanza Fuel pumps at Seppala Drive and Bering Street stayed at $5.949 for gasoline and $6.199 for diesel.

• Heard Mike Benchoff, one of the owners of the tug boat Rustler, address the Council during citizen comments. He once more counseled the panel concerning the state Open Meetings Law, negligence of which denies state constitutionally approved due process, he said. Benchoff has charged that his right to use the port has been discussed without his being notified and able to have representation at such sessions. The Rustler needed to satisfy certain orders of the Nome Port Commission and Common Council by Aug. 15 or according to a resolution passed by the Council at its July 23 meeting, Benchoff would be banned from port use forever and have his boat confiscated by a City-hired contractor. The Rustler did not appear on the agenda Monday, but a memo was available to the Council and the public concerning requirements to be met: payment of $5,144.04 owing on his account, proof of insurance required on vessels with a hazardous materials capacity of over 50 gallons, and proof that the Rustler could leave the harbor under its own power and return as proof of its functional state. Benchoff had paid up his account Monday. He told the Council he would acquire insurance if he were permitted to use his boat as intended in the harbor.

· Heard John Parks, a visitor to Nome, ask for the harbormaster's job description and back Benchoff. "I hope the city council takes very seriously the accusations made by this man today and people's rights are not violated," Parks said. Councilwoman Mary Knodel assured Parks that the Council would take Benchoff's remarks seriously and that Harbormaster Joy Baker's job description was on file with City Manager Josie Bahnke.

• Bahnke, in turn, at the end of the meeting stated that however the Rustler issue had been problematic in the court of public opinion, that "the City has followed all provisions of the open meeting act" and "Mr. Benchoff has been treated profes-

· Heard Knodel verify that the only requirements remaining for the Rustler to satisfy were proof of insurance and showing the ability to leave the harbor under its own power. Last week the U.S. Coast Guard certified Benchoff's boat free of pollution and no longer a threat to the marine environment.

Heard miner Cliff McHenry comment that although the port administration and port users have an interest in clean water practices, there was no facility for disposing of dirty or oily bilge water. No one had continued on page 5

Planning Panel: Some rules need stronger enforcement

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Planning Commission sent Dave McDowell home to get an as-built map of his property to aid the panel in considering a request for a several inch variance because a house he was building at 104 W. 3rd Ave. had missed the required 10-foot setback from the street by a couple of inches.

McDowell said he would measure again more carefully; maybe he wouldn't need a variance after all. The commission tabled his variance request pending more information.

In other business Aug. 7, the commission discussed a traffic hazard at the south end of West F Street where it meets River Street. Public Works Department has placed a temporary sign at the intersection where miners and associates zip onto the beach to access dredges on the south wall of the Small Boat Harbor.

Commissioners did not favor placing a year-around stop sign when the beach access would not be used because of several feet of snow. They proposed a temporary barricade along Gold Avenue that runs east and west along the beach, guiding drivers to enter the beach lane via West E Street that already has a permanent stop sign at River Street. West E Street is platted to meet Gold Avenue on the perpendicular where vehicles could turn right to go down Gold Avenue to the dredge area; West F Street is not platted through the sand to Gold Avenue

"It's a seasonal problem; we need to come up with a seasonal solution," Sparks said. Discussion yielded asking the city manager to support Public Works Dept. putting up a seasonal barricade. Meanwhile, many drivers ignore the temporary stop at River Street, commissioners observed.

In other business, the commission decided that a yurt is a structure, looking at a photo of one sitting near the street east of Anvil Square, and as such, needs a building permit and to meet certain requirements.

Commissioners discussed the need to tighten up several planning issues. Should construction on a building be underway without a building permit, the City's building inspector has the authority to issue a stop work order, but no fine is attached.

"It's a civil proceeding in court," Commissioner Tom Sparks observed. "It slows down City's ability to seek compliance. I like something more immediate you could do."

Nate Barron of Public Works concurred, noting other issues would be filling without a permit, excavating without a permit and leaving vehicles parked long-term where they block vision and snow removal.

Commissioner Randy Romenesko suggested that the city map be divided into sections, then attack compliance issues zone by zone, clearing vehicles, checking utility stub-up placement and such.

Commissioner Charley Weiss wanted a closer control on using building permits for the stated purpose.

"What do we do when someone applies for a noncommercial building permit and then uses it or a commercial structure?" he asked.

Commissioners said they would like to have more input in planning issues from other branches of city government, say Public Works and Nome Joint Utilities.

"When something comes up, we could help one another help the city," several observed.

Meanwhile, Eileen Bechtol, the City's contract planner would have a memo in the next meeting packet concerning the "A" word—annexation. The next meeting would be in September, commissioners decided, "after moose season," tentatively scheduled for Sept. 18.

Before accepting the new $190,000 vehicle, city officials requested a third-party inspection of the chassis wiring to address warranty issues and to ensure the ambulance is in top condition.

Alaska Sea Party outspent in battle over Ballot Measure 2

Outside interests pour money into campaign against restoration of Coastal Zone management

By Diana Haecker

Nome City manager Josie Bahnke just shook her head, wondering how anybody living in Alaska could possibly be against the restoration of the Alaska Coastal Management Program. "To me," she said, "voting against it would be totally un-Alaskan.

As early voting started on Monday in Anchorage, the story of this year's primary elections is the battle over Ballot Measure 2. The measure sprouted out of a grass roots initiative by the Alaska Sea Party, formed just for the purpose to restore a coastal management program in Alaska. Juneau Mayor Bruce Botelho spearheaded the effort and after a year of going through the process, collecting over 33,000 signatures from Alaskans and getting the initiative on the formal ballot, it is time for Alaskans to settle the fate of the coastal management program, something that the Alaska Legislature in one regular and two special sessions failed to accomplish.

The money trail

The majority of money contributed to an anti-Ballot Measure 2 group called "Vote No on 2" is streaming in from interests originating outside of Alaska and outside of the United States. According to campaign financing disclosures filed with the Alaska Public Office Commission, Vote No on 2 contributions are in a whole different league than financial support for the Alaska Sea Party, the proponents of the measure. While "Vote No on 2" as a war chest of about $800,000 to spend on advertising, the Alaska Sea Party is not even coming close with their $67,000 in contributions.

The top contributors against Ballot Measure 2 are Shell Exploration and Production, head offices in Netherlands, contribution: $150,000; Alaska Miner's Association, including Canadian mining companies, $158,145; Alaska Oil and Gas Association, $102,396; Donlin Gold LLC, joint venture of Canadian miners Barrick Gold and NovaGold, $50,355; and the Resource Development Council with $57,790. The Native regional corporation of Cook Inlet Regional Inc. also pitched in and contributed $10,000. Contributors also listed the value of in-kind contributions such as allowing staff to travel to the statewide hearings held on the measure or to organize ice cream socials. Supporters are also the Anchorage Tea Party and the Conservative Patriots group as well as elected officials from non-coastal areas like Mat-Su Borough Mayor Larry DeVilbiss, Palmer Mayor De-Lena Johnson and Wasilla Mayor Vern Rupright.

District T Senator Donnie Olson voiced concern about the origins of the "Vote No on 2" group's funding. "All their foreign money reminds me of when Outside fishing companies opposed statehood for Alaska," Senator Olson said. "Foreign interests shouldn't be able to influence how we, as Alaskans, manage our affairs. Do we want to go back to being an economic colony run by Alaskans? I don't think so.'

Ron Clarke with the Alaska Sea Party said that fundraising in support of the initiative only garnered $67,000 as of Monday, August 13. While the money is lacking, Ballot Measure 2 is supported by political heavy-weights like former Governor Tony Knowles, District T Senator Donnie Olson and the mayors of Alaska's oil-richest regions, the North Slope Borough and the Northwest Arctic Borough.

Clarke said that outside interests like Princess Cruises, headquartered in the tiny Mediterranean kingdom of Monaco, are contributing big time money to the opposition. "It makes me crazy to think that a lady from Buckland or Nome won't have a voice in the development of their coastal environment because a millionair in Monaco just signed a check supporting the campaign against Ballot Measure 2," Clarke said.

The five biggest financial supporters for Ballot Measure 2 are the North Slope Borough with a contribution of $15,137.97; the Bristol Bay Native Corporation with $10,000; Robert Gillam, CEO of McKinley Capital Management with $10,000, the Local ASEA/AFSCME union with $5,000 and the Municipality of Skagway with $2,000. Clarke added that the Alaska Sea Party has a very little budget to place ads in news outlets and is clearly outspent when it comes to advertising campaigns.

In a press release on Monday, Vote No on 2" campaign manager Willis Lyford interpreted the lack of money streaming into the campaign for the ballot measure as a sure sign of lack of Alaskans' support.

"What is becoming very clear is that Measure 2 has very narrow support," Lyford said. "Their recent state campaign finance reports at the end of July showed their campaign supporters included liberal environmentalists, public officials and state legislators who are solidly anti-development. They are behind Measure 2 because it creates new complex regulations, more costly bureaucracy and red tape, and will stifle resource development projects for years. Their agenda, in the form of Measure 2, is bad for our economy and jobs," said Lyford.

Teamsters Local 959 and Operating Engineers Local 302 joined the Vote No on 2" fight – reason being that the measure is supposedly "a job-killing proposal.'

In addition to industry, the Juneau Chamber of Commerce, the Ketchikan Chamber of Commerce and the Greater Palmer Chamber of Commerce are against the coastal management proposal. The Anchorage Municipal Assembly and the Mat-Su Borough Assembly passed resolutions opposing Measure 2.

Background

The Coastal Management program, a federal program existing in all the other 49 states of the union, was allowed to sunset last summer, when the Alaska legislature went into a stalemate over its extension.

The program was federally funded, existed in Alaska for 34 years and gave the state a voice in coastal development as industry could not propose developments inconsistent with state policies. The Coastal Management Act legally obligates the federal government to abide by state guidelines if a coastal management program is in place. Prior to 2003, when then-Governor Frank Murkowski gutted the program and abolished the coastal policy board, the board provided local input to proposed offshore and coastal projects.

North Slope Borough Mayor Charlotte Brower served on that board and she said in press conference of the Alaska Sea Party on Monday that local input improved rather than hindered projects.

During the press conference, former Governor Tony Knowles said that the conception that the re-establishment of ACMP would hinder progress, is wrong. "In the eight years of my administration," Governor Knowles said, "the coastal management program enabled one of Alaska's most active periods of new exploration for and increased development of oil and gas. The Northstar, Alpine, and Badami fields came on line, we opened millions of acres of federal land in the NPR-A. We saw continued production from the Red Dog and Greens Creek mines. The program worked well. It made sense then. It still makes sense

Mayor Charlotte Brower said that the North Slope Borough and the entire state needs development for its communities to succeed and thrive. 'You only have to look across the North Slope to see the success coastal management has had in promoting responsible development. Rather than stopping development, the coastal management program has proved to be an important vehicle for state and federal agencies to recognize our Borough's concerns. Equally important, the program has provided Alaska with a unique op-portunity to assert the state's rights," Brower said.

Brower also pointed out that the ACMP allowed the resolution of potential conflicts between proposed development and local concerns before lengthy court battles had to be

The initiative

The language of the initiative includes that the ACMP would be housed in the Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development instead of in the Dept. of Natural Resources. "The program would develop new state and local standards to review projects in coastal areas of the State," the initiative reads. The bill would create a coastal policy board consisting of 13 members: the commissioners of DNR, DEECD, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game and the Dept. of Environmental Conservation. The other nine pub-credit cards, but the Alaska Commercial store reports that the outage didn't affect their credit and debit card services. Many numbers at Lester Bench, long distance and GCI cell phone services were also affected. Loren Prosser, Wells Fargo Community Bank President confirmed that the outage affected all Wells Fargo bank systems. "This included our ATM as well as main bank systems," Prosser wrote in an email correspondence with the Nugget. "Credit cards use phone lines or the Internet to transmit data, so those would have been out community wide depending on the services folks had. We have numerous back up systems at Wells Fargo, and were able to transact business on a limited basis Thursday using these back ups. It was not ideal but was functional and we were able to keep our doors open despite the outage."

TelAlaska sent for a third employee, who arrived later in the day from Brevig Mission to help technicians John Gould and Steve Shelton to connect all the cables. The three technicians worked until 3:30 a.m. on Friday morning to get the cables spliced and the phone service up and

A healthy body helps build a healthy brain

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Education experts tell us that a healthy child can better handle the rigors of education. Here are a few health tips for preparing students for a healthy school year.

Nutrition: Focus on giving your kids real food. Many of us eat a processed concoction of chemicals and modified nutrients. In most cases, processed foods are not the healthiest option for our children.

Distinguishing tween real healthy foods and unhealthy foods labeled to look healthy can be confusing to children and parents alike. Nutritionists now encourage us to eat "real foods" as opposed to processed foods. This means looking for foods that have an ingredients list of one item or a short list of real foods.

For example look for a label that says, "Ingredients: Apples," or "Ingredients: Wheat, yeast, water, and salt." Foods harvested from the ocean or tundra are very nutritious. Limit foods that contain hydrogenated oils, nitrates, high fructose corn syrup, or artificial colors and flavors. Processed foods that contain a long list of chemicals or modified ingredients may inhibit learning, increase mental fatigue, worsen attention deficits and exacerbate behavior problems at school.

Medications: If your child takes prescription medications, make sure the prescriptions are up-to-date. It is a good idea to schedule a follow up visit with your child's doctor during the first few weeks of school to ensure that the dose of any medication is adjusted to match your child's new weight and school environment. You may also want to ask for a spare supply of some medications, like asthma treatments, to be kept in the school office for emergency use. An annual well child exam is also a good opportunity to ensure immunizations are up-to-date.

Vision: Around 80 percent of a child's learning involves the eyes. Most children will not tell a parent or teacher about blurred vision because they assume their vision is normal. Therefore, all children should receive vision screening annually. Consider formal testing with an eye doctor if your child has trouble with activities that require good vision like participation sports or reading the board from the back of a classroom. Headaches or trouble reading for long periods may be other signs of eye strain that may be corrected with glasses.

Sleep: Restorative sleep is essential to learning. The American Academy of Pediatrics reports that school-aged children need 9 - 10 hours of sleep each night. Sleep-deprived children will develop increasing problems with concentration, irritability, emotional swings, aggressive behavior and susceptibility to illness. Pediatricians also recognize a connection between sleep deprivation and obesity.

Clean Hands: Teach your child of time. As schools are forced to reduce physical education time to make room for meeting national standards it becomes imperative that parents allow time for active play and sports participation in their child's daily routine. Safe travel: Whether your child is walking, biking, driving, or riding the bus to school it is a good idea to > them. Wearing bright clothing, looking both ways before crossing, walking around vehicles in full view of the driver, and wearing a bike helmet may seem simple. But these lessons are very important for public safety during the congested start and end of each school day.

> respond differently to a new school year.

Some children develop anxiety regarding school or interactions with other students. Physical signs of internal emotions may be expressed as headaches, stomach pain or irritability. Take time to speak with your children about any fears or frustrations regarding their school environment. Monitor and immediately address any signs of bullying.

Maintaining a healthy body contributes to maintaining a healthy brain. Laying a good educational foundation for our children begins with establishing healthy nutritional and physical activity habits in the home.

Ten teams support Relay for Life

Story and photos by Diana Haecker

The third annual Relay for Life went underway in Nome last Saturday, with ten teams having pledged to send at least one walker around the block for 24 hours. "Cancer doesn't sleep and neither should we," said this year's Relay for Life organizer Jessilyn Dunkelberger.

The event served as a fundraiser for cancer research and the American Cancer Society. Organizers clad in Disney princess dresses led the walk around Old St. Joe's Hall, along Bering Street, Warren Place, Division Street and Third Avenue. Dunkelberger explained the dress-up saying that Nome picked the Disney theme to emphasize the motto of "magical rides" and to inspire people to believe in a wonderland, where everything is possible and dreams of beating cancer and sickness come true. Colorful paper bags with the names of cancer survivors and of those who lost their battle with cancer were arranged in front of the large Nome gold pan near the statues of the three Lucky Swedes.

The event began with an opening ceremony on Saturday at 1 p.m., continued with non-stop entertainment and as the sun slowly dropped near the horizon, a luminary ceremony brought out a large crowd of Nomeites, all touched by cancer in one way or another. Bering Sea Restaurant sponsored Bush 907 with DJ Al Burgo to emcee the entire event. Taking some of the emotional edge off, he threw in some contemporary songs that inspired the youth to get up and do the "cha-cha".

Catherine DeAngelis, bladder cancer survivor, took to the podium and told her story of how the Relay for Life inspired her when she had no strength to participate in organizing it yet she was the one who brought the event to Nome in 2010. Cancer survivor Lance Johnson then read a long list of Nomeites who survived and didn't survive cancer.

In honor of cancer survivors and those who died, nearly 150 Nomeites marched around the square, in an emotional walk and then released colorful helium balloons into the blue Nome evening sky.

By the end of the event, the goal of raising $35,000 for the American Cancer Society was almost reached as $27,000 were collected through various fundraising events of the ten teams. As of Tuesday, donations had climbed to $31,034.

BRINGING IT TO NOME — Nomeite Catherine DeAngelis brought the first Relay to Life event to Nome in 2010. She spoke during this weekend's event about her own battle with cancer.

PRINCESSES GALORE — This year's theme of the Nome Relay for Life was the Magical Ride and Nome organizers chose to pick the Disney interpretation of it. Thus, left to right, Veronica Alviso dressed as "Jasmine", Pamela Cushman turned into "Belle," cancer survivors Nina Grimes and Bob Blake wore their survivor shirts, Jessilyn Dunkelberger was "Pocahontas" and Rosemary Tootkaylok was "Snow White."

lic members would be appointed by the Governor and of each of the coastal districts. The bill would create nine coastal districts, much like it used to be, each with its own district plan. The bill would create the Division of Ocean and Coastal Management to issue state consistency determinations and respond to federal consistency determinations and certifications.

Nome's city manager Josie Bahnke said that through Nome's Coastal Resource Service Area plan and the ACMP program, the city had a great conduit to communicate with resource developers or the evergrowing suction dredging fleet. "Now our only way to communicate our concerns is through the Port of Nome," Bahnke said. She added that the coastline and unspoiled beauty of it is one of Nome's greatest resources. "It was a no-brainer for the city to support the initiative with a resolution," Bahnke said.

The Nome Common Council voted unanimously in early July to pass a resolution in support of the Alaska Coastal Management Program initiative. The resolution states that "state and local governments and coastal districts wish to have a meaningful voice in the development of our coastal lands and waters;" and that "a Coastal gives Management Program Alaskans the means to address the unique conditions existing along our coastline in a way that the federal government cannot."

Jim Dory, the City's engineering technician, retired and among several other tasks, his was to do consistency reviews under the ACMP program. The city is currently recruiting to fill the position again, and if voters on the primary election on August 28 agree, the new person will also be handling the ACMP reviews.

Obituary

Senator Al Adams

On Aug. 13, 2012, Sen. Al Adams passed away peacefully at home surrounded by family. Albert P. Sikkiagruk Adams was born June 18, 1942, in Kotzebue.

Senator Al Adams

He attended Mount Edgecumbe High School in Sitka. Following high school, he attended the University of Alaska Fairbanks and RCA Technical Institute.

The late senator lived a life of service and was known for a generosity of spirit and drive to help others in both his public and private life.

To his family, he was a beloved husband, father and grandfather for whom family was the highest priority. He often organized subsistence hunting and fishing trips for his children, where he passed down traditional Iñupiaq skills. He coordinated all the logistics for these memorable outings and even served as camp cook, making sure everyone else was

Whether dipnetting at the mouth of the Kenai, caribou hunting outside Kotzebue or visiting the fish wheel at Chitina, he let his wife, children and grandchildren know that they were loved and that they came first and foremost in his life.

He was also a romantic and loving husband, planning vacations for his wife, Diane, to celebrate and share the milestones they achieved together as a couple. Travel was one of his favorite pastimes and one he loved to share with her.

Although he led a very public life, he also was a man of many unsung good deeds on a personal level. Many people did not know that he kept cash in his vehicle console to give to those in need, or that he provided meals to those who were hungry. At Christmas, boxes of turkeys would arrive at Bean's Café and money for holiday goody bags would arrive at the Friends Church. The individual recipients never knew who had lent them a hand.

Even as his illness progressed, he cared for others and tried to ease their worries with humor. He wanted others to be comfortable and to enjoy life. He put people first and was always prepared to serve them. He believed in God, in a higher power, and was a teacher and mentor to many.

Publicly, the late senator's service to his beloved state improved the lives of those he represented in rural Alaska. His long career in public service began in the late 1960s and included eight years in the Alaska State House beginning in 1980, during which he represented District 37, which included the communities of the NANA/Maniilaq and Arctic Slope regions. From 1988-2000, he served in the Alaska State Senate, also representing the Bering Straits/Kawerak region.

Following his retirement from the Alaska State Legislature, Sen. Adams served as president of Adams Management Services and worked for the Northwest Arctic Borough and North Slope Borough as an advisor, sharing his understanding of state government and how it could help the people of rural Alaska.

In 2003, he began a new career as a lobbyist with a focus on representing rural and Alaska Native interests. He again provided a powerful voice in Juneau and Washington, D.C., drawing on his years of state legislative experience. He brought the same passion to lobbying that he had as a legislator, always saying those he represented weren't his clients, they were his people. He tirelessly promoted the continued successes of Mount Edgecumbe High School because of the valuable opportunities it provides to develop relationships between talented young Alaska Native people.

Sen. Adams' hospitality to his peers, staff, clients and visitors at the capitol is still remembered to this day. His door and telephone lines were always open to Alaskans, no matter where they lived. He worked hard to guarantee that rural Alaska gained its fair share of state funding and joined his colleagues on statewide efforts that benefitted all Alaskans

An astute lawmaker, he was a master at understanding politics and state finances and chaired the powerful House Finance Committee during his eight-year term in the State House. He served 18 years on the Legislative Budget and Audit Committee and 12 years on the Operating Budget Conference Committee. He served on other key committees that helped protect subsistence and bring needed infrastructure and social services to rural Alaska.

He fought hard for the establishment and continued existence of the Power Cost Equalization (PCE) program; convincing the Alaska Legislature to establish an endowment to fund PCE in perpetuity.

Prior to his legislative service, he held other positions as president of Kikiktagruk Inupiat Corporation and executive vice president of NANA Regional Corporation. He also served on numerous boards including the Alaska Airlines Advisory Board, Arctic Power, Mount Edgecumbe and NANA Regional Corpo-

He was preceded in death by his mother, Sarah Seeberger; sister, Vicky Bartholme, and his father, Frank Scott, and his much loved aunts and uncles.

Saying It Sincerely

By Rev. Julia Yoder Elmore Pastor of Community United Methodist Church and a member of the Nome Ministerial Association

Scripture Reference: John 6:35, 41-51

Recently, I have become more aware of seeing God in the ordinary. God often uses ordinary people to accomplish God's extraordinary works. I saw God last week in the ordinariness of berry picking with my husband as we were in a place where everything ripe was pretty well picked over. After picking here and there, we decided to head back and return to that spot again when the blueberries were riper. As we headed back to the car, we saw so many salmonberries that we did not know where to start.

As I picked salmonberries, I was reminded of other times when I wanted to give up, especially in relation to my health. For most of my life I have struggled with my weight and find it easy to slip back into old habits when things get stressful in other parts of my life. Somehow this time is different, as God has placed people in my life and I have found accountability and structure through them. I have at least one friend who is dedicated to exercising with me at one of the most insane hours of the morning. My husband has started counting the calories he puts into his body as well. Others are on the sidelines throughout the community and Facebook cheering me on. Without God working through these people to encourage me it would be so easy to just go back to life as usual which will lead back to a place of unhealthiness

God has a plan for each of us and does not want us to stay broken as we are. Although we are God's beautiful creations, fearfully and wonderfully made, we are prone to sin and often hurt one another, ourselves and God. It is tempting to participate in activities that cause separation from God because often they feel good as we do them. God challenges us and shapes us into the disciples we were intended to be and it is not easy. Through God's grace we are challenged to a journey toward spiritual wholeness, which impacts other

My hope and prayer is that this week you will find God in the ordinary and reflect on how God is challenging you to be a better disciple. In the passage mentioned above, some of the people in the crowd to whom Jesus was speaking did not like Jesus saying that he was the bread of life. How could someone so ordinary claim to be something so extraordinary? Through this, we are challenged to look around us and see how God is indeed at work, whether we want to acknowledge it or not.

DUCKS IN A ROW— This family of greater scaup ducks (Aythya marila) waddled across Seppala Drive from the airport to the Snake River to get on with their swimming lessons, on Wednesday, August 8.

Trooper Beat

On August 5, at approximately 12:10 a.m., two 17-year old males in Stebbins climbed a fence and stole two 4 wheelers. The 4 wheelers belong to STG Inc., which is a contractor for AVEC (Alaska Village Electric Cooperative). An employee of STG saw the theft and pursued the juveniles on another 4-wheeler. The boys damaged the fence as they made their escape. The boys drove the ATVs at a high rate of speed through the village and used a group of people walking in the road as a barrier to further escape the employee. One of the boys rolled the 4 wheeler he was driving and the employee stopped to reclaim the ATV. When he did this, his own 4 wheeler was taken from him. One of the boys spit in the employee's face and threatened to assault him. The employee was then surrounded by the boys. The employee was able to lock himself in a front-end loader in an attempt to get away from the juveniles. The employee called other workers to respond to help him safely leave the area. Following the incident, STG removed their employees from Stebbins and suspended the work on the tank farm. The tank farm is approximately one month away from being completed and unless it is finished, the village will not be able to take on fuel for the win-

AST responded to Stebbins to investigate and was able to identify the juveniles involved. A community meeting was held on August 9, where STG and AVEC met with community members. The contractors will return to Stebbins on Sunday to continue

On August 10, the two juveniles were arrested and transported them to Nome where they were remanded at the Nome Youth Facility.

On August 8, at approximately 4:00 p.m. Alaska State Troopers located Rhonda Komok, 45, a resident of Kodiak, at Mile 16 Chiniak HWY during a traffic stop. Komok was wanted on three different arrest warrants, 2 for Violating Conditions of Release ($10,000.00 bail) and 1 for Theft II and Issuing Bad Checks ($100,000.00 bail). Komok was taken into custody without incident and transported to the Kodiak jail.

On August 11, AST seized 16 bottles of liquor en route to Gambell at an airline in Nome. Two suspects have been identified and criminal charges will be forwarded to a prosecuting agency.

Mary's Igloo receives National Endowment for the Arts grant

The National Endowment for the Arts recently announced 80 "Our Town" grant awards totaling $4.995 million and reaching 44 states and the District of Columbia. The Native Village of Mary's Igloo is one of the grantees and will receive $50,000 to design the new Mary's Igloo Community Development Center.

Through "Our Town", the NEA supports creative place making projects that help transform communities into lively, beautiful and sustainable places with the arts at their core. The grantee projects will improve quality of life, encourage creative activity, create community identity and a sense of place, and help revitalize local economies. All "Our Town" grant awards were made to partnerships that consisted of a minimum of a not-for-profit organization and a local government entity.

The Native Village of Mary's Igloo will be working with an architectural design firm and the Cold Climate Housing Research Center on community engagement and design activities for the Mary's Igloo Community Development Center in Teller. The new economic development and cultural heritage center will be designed through three design charrette meetings with the community and with local artists. The proposed facility will include a museum, cultural heritage room, library, commercial teaching kitchen, artisan workshop, small business operation spaces, lodging for tourists, gift shop and storage. The facility will integrate local indigenous culture, pubart and sustainable. climate-appropriate building technologies as part of its design.

"Cities and towns are transformed when you bring the arts - both literally and figuratively - into the center of them," said NEA Chairman Landesman. "From Teller, Alaska to Miami, Florida, communities are pursuing creative placemaking, making their neighborhoods more vibrant and robust by investing in the performing, visual, and literary arts. I am proud to be partnering with these 80 communities and their respective arts, civic, and elected leaders.'

The NEA received 317 applications for Our Town that were assigned to one of three application review panels based on their project type; arts engagement, cultural planning and design, or non-metro and tribal communities. With only 80 grants emerging from the 317 applications, or a success rate of 25 percent, competition was strong, a testament to the artistic excellence and merit of the Native Village of Mary's Igloo. Native Village of Mary's Igloo received a cultural planning and design grant award.

Nome Elementary and Jr./Sr. High School fail to make AYP

Of 507 Alaska public schools, 236 schools made adequate yearly progress in the 2011-2012 school year under the federal No Child Left Behind Act, the Alaska Department of Education and Early Development announced on Monday.

Meeting yearly progress requirements were the following schools: St, Michael, Teller, Stebbins, Unalakleet, Wales and White Mountain as well as Nome's Anvil City Science Academy, the Nome Extensions Correspondence and the Nome Youth Facility.

Not meeting AYP for the 2011/2012 school year are Nome Elementary School, Nome-Beltz Jr./Sr. High School; the schools in Elim, Brevig Mission, Little Diomede, Gambell, Savoonga, Koyuk, Golovin, Shaktoolik and Shishmaref.

Every year, the state measures schools' progress toward the federal law's goal that 100 percent of students be proficient in language arts and mathematics by spring 2014. Students' proficiency is measured by their performance on state assessments in reading, writing and mathematics in grades 3 through 10. The reading and writing scores are combined into one language arts score for calculating adequate yearly

Behind, schools must meet targets for the percentage of students who are proficient, as well as targets for attendance, graduation and participation in state assessments.

If schools meet all of their targets, they have made adequate yearly progress. The targets for school year 2011-2012 are the same as for the prior school year: 82.88 percent proficient in language arts; 74.57 percent proficient in mathematics; 95 percent assessment-participation rate; 85 percent attendance rate (for schools that do not have grade 12); and 85 percent graduation rate or an increase of 2 percentage points in the graduation rate (for schools that have

The targets for language arts, mathematics, and participation in assessments apply not only to a school's assessed students as a whole, but to nine subgroups of students, if a subgroup has at least 26 students in a school: African-American, Alaska Native/American Indian, Asian, Caucasian, Hispanic, Multi-Ethnic, Economically Disadvantaged, Students with Disabilities, and Limited English Proficient Students. New this year is a federal requirement that subgroups of students meet the graduation rate target if there are at least three students in the

Unalakleet under water restrictions

By Diana Haecker

A perennial problem arose recently in Unalakleet again as water consumption goes up and the community's four-inch water line to the water source can't keep up with the demand. The result: a water shortage that forces city officials to ask community members to conserve water.

Unalakleet's City Administrator Herb Ivanoff said that Unalakleet's

1-million gallon water tank is running very low. The water level of the 22-ft. tall tank is at five-and a-half feet, Ivanoff said. Water consumption rises in the summer as the Norton Sound Seafood Products plant in Unalakleet uses water to make ice and to process fish. Ivanoff said that water consumption in the summer rises to about 80 gallons per minute whereas the four-inch water line supplying the town with water can only carry 68 gallons per minute. According to Ivanoff, the city is conducting a study with help of a consultant to remedy the annual chagrin. Ivanoff said he hopes to develop a plan this fall and work on a cost estimate in order to move the water source to the North River and install a bigger

Crab fishermen fetch record prices for red king crab harvest

By Jim Menard, ADF&G Area Management Biologist

Record prices paid for Norton Sound red king crab resulted in the 2012 Norton Sound summer king crab fishery setting a record exvessel value. Norton Sound permit holders harvested 440,000 pounds of red king crab in the open access commercial king crab fishery for a record payout of $2.4 million. It was backto-back record payouts for Norton Sound crab fishermen as this year's exvessel value exceeded the previous record exvessel value of $2 million in 2011

In 2012 Norton Sound red king crab prices paid to fishermen ranged from $5.25 to $5.60 per pound. Although the record harvest for Norton Sound red king crab of nearly three million pounds occurred in 1979 the price paid then was only 75 cents per pound. This summer's harvest was the highest red king crab harvest since 1986.

The CDQ portion of the crab fishery remains open with slightly over 17,000 pounds of red king crab remaining on the quota of 34,910 pounds. The combined open access and CDQ harvest this year will be approximately 475,000 pounds of

Congratulations to Norton Sound permit holders and crew members and to the seafood workers who were able to keep the processing line moving smoothly in 2012 with the highest red king harvest in over 25 years.

Youth softball captures Kotzebue's crown

By Jeremy Masters

Nome Youth Softball players brought home a championship from the Kotzebue Softball Association's annual vouth tournament held August 2-4. The team went 3-1 in the double elimination tournament, winning the championship game Saturday evening by a score of 10-4 over OTZ Wireless. The contest was highlighted by a towering two run home-run by male tournament MVP James Horner. Unlike the 25-17 loss between the same two teams just a few hours earlier, this game was a defensive battle. Flashing the leather most notably were female tournament MVP Ivory Okleasik at third base, tournament All Star Josh Gologergen in left field, and Josh Cannon at second base.

Nome won their first two games in very tight fashion. A nine to eight Thursday night victory over Kotzebue's Maniilaq BHS was followed by a 14-12 Friday win over OTZ Wireless. In total, five teams vied for the title. Noatak, Nome, and three teams from Kotzebue. They were Maniilaq BHS, OTZ Wireless, and NANA Hunters.

In addition to the team's championship trophy and aforementioned individual accolades, second basewoman Sierra Tucker and pitcher Bobby Pate were awarded tournament All Star honors. During a skills competition held Friday, Ivory Okleasik won for fastest female baserunner and James Horner won the male home run derby. Mary Miller took second in the female home run derby.

Thirteen players were selected for the team by combining player votes, coach votes, fundraising efforts, and sportsmanship throughout the regular season. Every single player contributed on the field and represented themselves properly off of it. The team was led by head coach Lance Cannon. Assistant coaches were Jeremy Master and Buddy Okleasik. Cari Miller chaperoned. Her efforts were equally essential to the team's success. The championship roster consisted of Taeler Brunette, Josh Cannon, Annalise Contreras, Jason Gilder, Josh Gologergen, Oliver Hoogendorn, Wilson Hoogendorn, James Horner, Nolan Horner, Mary Miller, Ivory Okleasik, Robert Pate and Sierra Tucker.

Back on the home front, all Youth Softball divisions concluded last week. The Minors Division was won by Tim Motis' Bonanza Fuel squad. A strong team all season, they defeated GCI and PLS Construction twice to earn the title. Wells Fargo won the majors division, led by coaches Buddy Okleasik and Wilson Bourdon. After a winless regular season, Wells Fargo turned the tables on top seeds Milano's Pizzeria and Alaska Logistics. Their unprecedented sweep of the playoff tournament culminated Wednesday afternoon with a 3-1 victory. The season's finish was celebrated Thursday with a cookout at the fields.

Many thanks are due to the sponsors of the Nome Youth Softball League: Bering Air, Nome CHARR, Nome Eskimo Community, NSEDC, PLS Construction, Nome Machine Works, Wells Fargo, Milano's Pizzaria, Alaska Logistics, GCI, Bonanza Fuel, and Jolly Roger Designs. Thanks are also due to all the volunteer coaches in all three divisions: Rosemary Tootkaylok, Tim Motis, Mitch Erickson, Jacob Carl, Tom Moran, Lance Cannon and Buddy Okleasik. Thank you to all the other players, parents, and contributors for the ongoing fundraising effort. Bonanza-Delta Western $1.5 million fight stays in Alaska

By Sandra L. Medearis

When still-to-be settled reasons blocked Delta Western from delivering a barge load of assorted petroleum products to Bonanza Fuel last fall, Sitnasuak Native Corp. made the business decision to have an alternate vendor bring in the oil and

The other retail vendor in Nome. Crowley Petroleum Distributors, offered to sell Bonanza some fuel from storage in Nome and sell some of its surplus in Kotzebue to be flown in. Sitnasuak's president, Jason Evans, opted to work with Vitus Marine, based in Anchorage, to obtain the fuel. Vitus Marine contracted with the ice class tanker Renda based in

That decision put Nome at the center of a media feed when the U.S. Coast Guard icebreaker Healy in January guided a Russian tanker into the harbor through the ice after stops for fuel in South Korea and Dutch Harbor. That exercise not only shined up the City of Nome and the Coast Guard's pitch for a new icebreaker to ply arctic waters, but Bonanza Fuel claimed the tanker trip cost the Sitnasuak subsidiary $1.5 million beyond what it would have cost for a timely Delta Western de-

Bonanza wanted that money back and filed suit in state Superior Court against Delta Western in February to get it back. In mid-March, Delta Western moved the case to federal court in Anchorage, saying DW was a Seattle company, while Bonanza was an Alaska company. That difference in location of the companies and that the suit pertained to a maritime issue took it out of the jurisdiction of Alaska state court and into federal court for Western District of Washington in Seattle, DW claimed.

Late last week, the U.S. District Court ruled that the case stays in Alaska—a victory for Bonanza Fuel that was balanced by a loss when the court then denied a motion by Bonanza to bring the case home to state court in Nome. The controversy remains in federal court in Anchorage, the federal court ruled.

During the debate, Bonanza said that DW was an Alaska company, and feathered the claim by showing that a Delta Western web site claimed from 2005 it was an Alaska company. Aw, they were just spoofing, DW said, to make Alaska consumers comfortable with buying their products. Rather, DW argued, an agreement signed for petroleum product delivery in 2006 said that any disagreements would be litigated in Washington. That "forum selection clause" had not been changed since and was still in effect during the 2011 delivery season, DW claimed.

Nothing doing, said the Seattle court, according to documents filed last week. Bonanza did not get fuel through DW in the 2010 season, but through Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. with other transportation, amounting effectively to a break in the Bonanza-DW agree-

Court documents show that DW said in an e-mail last spring that a new contract for 2011 would be forthcoming, but it did not arrive. Therefore, the "forum selection clause" expired in 2010 at the latest, the court ruled.

The court denied Bonanza's motion to have the case heard in Alaska Superior Court in Nome, agreeing that Delta Western's "nerve center" was in Seattle, not Anchorage, Additionally, the federal court "has diver-

Sitnasuak wants White Alice gone

By Diana Haecker

The large parabolic antennas on top of Anvil Mountain may soon be a sight of the past as the Sitnasuak Native Corporation last week decided to direct the Air Force to remove the towers for good. Quoting the wish not to obligate future directors of the board or shareholders to the risk of personal injury lawsuits or financial liabilities, the Sitnasuak board voted to have them taken down. Sitnasuak President Charles Fagerstrom issued a press release on Monday saying that Sitnasuak received notification from the Air Force that the Anvil Mountain towers were not a demolition project and that the Air Force would be leaving the structures standing given the local interest that dates back to 1996. During the quarterly meeting last week, the Sitnasuak board of directors were made aware of the Air Forces' stance and after a long discussion, Fagerstrom said, the board voted to direct the Air force to remove the towers.

Fagerstrom said that the board wants ownership to the 11-acre site through the Alaska Land Transfer Acceleration Act and directors believe that the land would be valuable for future tele-communications. For that purpose, Sitnasuak wants a clean After the vote, the SNC press release said, they informed the Air Force of their decision as well as Nome City Manager Josie Bahnke and Nome Museum and Library Commission chairman John Hande-

However, as of Tuesday, the Air Force has not received such information and declined to comment until SNC gives official notification of their decision.

The land used for the White Alice, the military's distant early warning line system during the cold war, spreads over 11.7 acres atop Anvil Mountain.

The use of toxic polychlorinated biphenyl and leaking fuel tanks left contamination on the installation grounds. The U.S. Air Force's 611th civil engineer squadron at Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson has been charged to cleanup the site before it can be transferred into the public do-

Sitnasuak Native Corporation selected the land and after the cleanup would be complete, the Air Force would turn the land over to the federal Bureau of Land Management.

BLM field officer Tom Sparks said in an email correspondence that the BLM has worked cooperatively with Sitnasuak Native Corporation and the USAF on the conveyance of property at Anvil Mountain to Sitnasuak as part of its ANCSA entitlement. Runway closure and bad weather limit jet traffic to Nome

By Diana Haecker

An emergency repair that was supposed to start last week put the main runway of the Nome International Airport out of commission starting August 13 until October 1.

The ramifications of the runway closure were compounded by a week of constant rain, fog and low hanging clouds. Seven Alaska Airlines flights were canceled, no cargo planes made it in all week, except for one NAC cargo plane on Monday, August 13.

Not until Saturday and Sunday could cargo planes land in Nome with two NAC aircraft arriving on Sunday and one Everts Air Cargo plane on Saturday.

By Friday, empty produce shelves at Hanson's grocery store bore testament to the lack of goods coming into Nome. Post office boxes produced not even junk mail. And people who opted to get out of the rain and to watch a movie were out of luck, too. "Total Recall", the movie that was supposed to play at the local Gold Coast movie theatre didn't make it into Nome, either.

KNOM reports, that the construction crew that was supposed to start fixing the runway was stranded in Anchorage, due to the double problem of runway closure and bad weather.

People attempting to travel from Anchorage to Nome on Friday went to Kotzebue twice but couldn't make it to Nome.

Alaska Airlines, the only passenger jet service with three regular daily flights to Nome, is bound to see delays from now until the runway is fixed. Alaska Airlines spokeswoman Marianne Lindsey said that the Nome runway closure is impacting flights as weather and visibility is the limiting factor, causing delays. "Because the instrument landing system that allows us to land in Nome in the poorest weather is for

To the Editor,

My letter to the editor on page two in the August 16 Nome Nugget responding to an August 9 letter to the editor from NSEDC's Janis Ivanoff contains a URL linked to a YouTube video. A character was omitted when the Nugget staff transcribed the URL, which made the link not work.

The correct link to the YouTube video is below.

committee meeting The YouTube clip is the audio recording and supporting documents related to the story published on page four of the August 9, Nugget entitled, "Tim Smith expelled from NSEDC meeting for recording committee session.

The August 9 and 16 Nuggets are available online http://www.nomenugget.net/ in case you can't find your printed copies of the paper.

Janis Ivanoff's letter contained false accusations of offenses she claims I committed and malicious misrepresentations of my words and actions. The YouTube clip was posted so that people can decide for themselves which of the conflicting accounts of what transpired at the meeting is truthful.

NSEDC made a statement in the paper saying, "NSEDC maintains its policy of keeping the great majority of its board and committee meetings open to the public. At this point, NSEDC cannot say whether this courtesy will continue to be extended to Smith."

The day before NSEDC's above statement, came out, their lawyer, Howard Trickey, wrote me a letter saying, "NSEDC has determined that its board members and staff require formal protection. Please be aware that you are no longer permitted to enter any NSEDC premises or property, to attend NSEDC events. or to attend NSEDC board meetings. Any violations of these restrictions and any threats or confrontations with board members or employees will be reported immediately to the proper authorities." Apparently, lawyer Trickey was able to say what NSEDC could not say the day before NSEDC could not say it.

His letter goes on to say without explanation, "It is not NSEDC's intent to limit your participation in any of NSEDC's programs; however, all communication with NSEDC must be in writing. And, with the exception of program or funding applications, all communications must be sent to my office." I'm having a hard time figuring out how this does not eliminate any possibility of my participation in NSEDC's programs but I guess I'll have to write to Mr. Trickey to find out.

I've had to put up with a lot of insults from NSEDC over the years because they think they are, in Janis Ivanoff's words, a "private" organization. This latest one is going way too far. NSEDC's business is not private and it is long past time for them to learn that.

Lots of people have been asking me rhetorically, "What do they have to hide?" I think we need to find out.

An old friend and longtime fisherman asked me last night why I don't just give up like everybody else did a long time ago. I haven't seen him at an NSEDC meeting for years. If NSEDC didn't pay its board members $600 a day they wouldn't be there either. Most of the time, I'm the only one at these meetings who isn't paid to attend. I've been going to NSEDC meetings now for more than 20 years and I'll have to admit, it's mostly a waste of time.

There is a funny thing about civil rights though; it's not that big of a deal to have to sit at the back of the bus unless you're the one being forced to do it and then it becomes a very big deal.

Vote "Yes" on Ballot Issue #2

It's time to flex our muscles. Rural Alaska has been dominated by the big cities. We are outnumbered. Anchorage can carry the state by sheer force of numbers. However, if rural Alaskans get out to vote next Tuesday we can kick butt. There is hope.

There is hope that voters in Anchorage aren't taken in by the big money ads that assume we are all ignorant. Hopefully folks can see through the voice of the "expert" who has "studied" the issue (like no one else has a brain). Hopefully we don't fall for the "jobs" excuse. We also need to take a look at who's paying for the vote "no" ads. It's big corporations like Royal Dutch Shell. It's to their advantage to avoid Alaska's strict oil spill requirements and be held accountable to the weaker federal regulations. Coastal Zone Management is nothing new. It was put into law by Gov. Hammond in 1977 and has assisted development until last year when Gov. Parnell killed the Act.

Without a Coastal Zone Management Plan big government, foreign entities, large corporations and their lawyers can steam roller rural Alaska. Our fate is in the hands of folks who don't give a damn about anything but making money with our resources. Coastal Zone Management gives us little guys in small communities a voice in our own destiny. Every eligible voter in western Alaska needs to beat feet to the polls. We can vote early. We need to flex our political strength and not let Anchorage and big bucks throw us to the wolves. Vote "yes' on Ballot Issue #2 and save the coast. -N.L.M.

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

In the spirit of the 1900 Nome Gold Rush, the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum has been pleased to present "The 1900 Diary of Wilfred A. McDaniel" which began its run in The Nome Nugget Newspaper back in early June. There are just a few weeks left in the diary.

The result of this determined perseverance is the documentation of the lives of successful beach miners in the Nome gold rush era as well as an insight into the Eskimo people who lived at the Penny, Cripple and Sinuk Rivers at that time. Wilfred died at the age of 80 in 1954, however his thoughts, memories and love of Nome are preserved forever as his legacy in the "McDaniel Family the closed runway, we need better weather to be able to land. The only available runway is shorter and there may be times when we cannot carry a full load of passengers or cargo," she said. "If the wind favors landing on runway 3, we need visibility of 1 1/4 mile or better and cloud ceiling of 400 feet."

Lindsey said that Alaska Airlines will try to bring in larger aircraft when the weather looks promising. "Over the weekend and Monday, when there was a break in the weather, we were able to get in three freighters, which has nearly caught us up with our cargo," she said.

Alaska Airlines are rebooking customers who chose to wait and travel at another time and they are refunding tickets without any penalties or fees.

The only two cruise ships that made landfall in Nome this summer picked last week to do so and tourists' plans to hop on a chartered jet to fly out of Nome had to be changed. German visitors arriving on the Hanseatic on Tuesday were loaded back up on the ship and taken to Kotzebue for the transfer. David Olson with Bering Air said that Bering Air ran two charter planes to shuttle some Hanseatic passengers out to Anchorage. Another plane flew visitors who arrived in Nome with the ResidenSea cruiseship The World to Galena and Fairbanks, where private jets were waiting to whisk them home.

The Era station manager in Nome said that they saw an increase in passengers flying on Era's scheduled trip from Nome to Unalakleet and on to Anchorage.

Since only the north-south runway is open, weather and winds have to be favorable in order for jets or larger planes to land. At 5,576 feet, the runway is shorter than the currently closed 6,001-foot east-west runway and pilots don't want to land with more than 10 knot tail winds, as it would push the plane further down the runway than would be safe. Also, the north-south runway is only approachable from the south, off the water, and offers no instrumental, precision approach. This poses no problem for smaller bush planes such as those operated by Era or Bering Air, but larger planes need certain conditions to manage safe landings.

The runway repairs are emergency repairs that have been in the making since this spring. A dip caused by settling of material underneath the pavement on the west end of the runway has been getting worse and the Dept. of Transportation allocated money for the emergency repair to be done this summer.

According to DOT spokeswoman Meadow Bailey, the design portion of the project took some time and that's why the project is starting toward the tail end of the summer construction season.

We were concerned that the dip would be getting worse and that we'd have to close down the runway for the winter," Bailey said. The $1.5 million project was awarded to contractor Twin Peaks. They are tasked to tear up the pavement, perform dynamic compaction of the material underneath, repaye and stripe the pavement.

Twin Peaks was contacted by phone but didn't respond in time for an update on the runway project.

CLOSED— The DOT last week closed the East-West Runway, with the dotted line, for emergency repairs. The only runway available until October 1 is the North-West runway, marked with a 3 at the South end.

does not change our goal to convey the property transfer via the Alaska Land Transfer Acceleration Act and ANCSA," Sparks wrote.

Fagerstrom explained that there is quite a complex history whether or not the White Alice should be removed. He said that in 2009 the Sitnasuak board directed the Air Force to remove them. In 2010, Sitnasuak instructed the Air Force and the Bureau of Land Management to leave them standing. This year, the board again voted to take them down.

The City of Nome also has a stake in the matter as it had been negotiating a contract to lease the property from Sitnasuak with the towers standing. City manager Josie Bahnke was out of town and unavailable to comment by press time. John Handeland commented that there were no formal discussions with Sitnasuak since their last meeting and the vote to remove the towers. "Hopefully we'll have another opportunity to visit with Sitnasuak and figure out if there is another option, if we can come up with a solution to leave them standing," Handeland said. He added that the White Alice has significance to Nome, the region and the entire country as historic Cold War relics as well as their role as unique Nome landmarks.

LEPC addresses siren complaints, explosives storage and stranded Coasties

By Diana Haecker

The siren going off at noon. For some it's fail-safe sign that it's lunch-time, for others it's a nuisance they want gone.

Nome Police Chief John Papasodora brought the issue to the Local Emergency Planning Commission during their regular meeting last week and said there had been two complaints about the daily ritual of testing the emergency siren in Nome.

The complaints elicited vigorous headshaking at the panel, as long time Nome emergency volunteers and professionals know that the daily test of the siren is a crucial part of emergency preparedness.

Long time ambulance volunteer Charlie Lean made a motion to resurrect a one-page policy paper that explains the tones and the necessity to run a test every day.

Papasodora asked to change the language of the motion to ask the Nome Common Council to formally support the testing of the siren, the purpose of it and to present Lean's one-page explanations as an addendum. Paul Kosto added to make clear that the LEPC supports the continued use of the siren, "as we've been doing, for like, the last 40 years."

The motion passed unanimously. Harbor master Joy Baker brought to the LEPC's attention that Northland Services have requested to store about 54 container vans of ammonium nitrate from the Rock Creek mine at the city's port pad until the next barge arrives to be shipped out of Nome. Baker declined the request for storage based on the proximity to the fuel tank farms, but agreed to get a consensus from the Port Commission and Emergency Services on the issue.

Ammonium nitrate in itself is not an explosive, but mixed with a spark and diesel, it is highly volatile. Baker asked the panel to support her position of denying the request and the LEPC obliged. After discussion, the panel agreed to deny the request and passed a resolution to present to the City Council in support of developing a policy that will deny storage of explosives at the Port.

Baker also addressed the LEPC with the request that Nome should have a mechanism on the books to deal with large amounts of people becoming involuntarily stranded in Nome

This comes from a lesson learned of a rather minor incident last week. The Coast Guard cutter Munro was in town Wednesday and left Thursday. The ship was anchored outside the port and ferried Coasties to town and back to the ship. Baker said, they did that three or four times when the ocean weather and waves got to stormy to run more small vessels out to the Munro. Around 7 p.m. Baker received a phone call that they ceased small boat operations and that there were 32 Coasties stranded in town, including officers and the Captain. Most of them found rooms in hotels and local B&Bs, but twelve were still looking for a place to put their heads down, but ended up spending the night at the National Guard Armory. The scramble was on to find them bedding and blankets.

LOCAL

While the "stranding" constituted no emergency, Baker said that those incidents are bound to happen more frequently in the future as more ship traffic comes through the Bering Strait and ocean weather and flying weather don't always cooperate with airline schedules or travel plans.

This was not the only incident when Nome's capacity for putting up unintentional visitors was almost tested.

"Just the other day, we could've easily ended up with 120 cruise ship passengers being stranded in Nome, because their plane didn't make it in," Baker said. The cruise ship Hanseatic stopped in Nome on Tuesday, offered its passengers a land tour of Nome and for some, their cruise ended here. But the charter jet that was supposed to pick them up and fly them out didn't make it in due to weather and the closed main runway. The tourists were loaded back on the ship and taken to Kotzebue.

Baker asked the LEPC to support the idea to come up with a quick mechanism to deal with stranded people in Nome. "Let's come up with a routine format so we don't have to scramble for blankets when they're needed," she said.

School Board gears up for 2012-13 school year

By Lori Head

The Nome Board of Education met in a regular meeting on August 14, 2012, with three board members present: President Betsy Brennan, Vice-President Barb Nickels and Barb Amarok. New faces at the table up front included Paula Coffman, NPS Business Manager and Sheri Boyles, District Administrative Assistant.

Bill Potter, School Maintenance Foreman, reported on several Capital Improvement projects:

• Elementary LED Lighting – It was noted that the board was meeting under the new LED lights in the library and Potter said the pool should be under the same lighting soon. On a lighter note, no pun intended, he commented that after the LED lights were installed, one area needed to be repainted because walls that appeared clean under the previous lighting actually needed some attention.

• Elementary Gym Floor – Nome City Council granted funds for this project. Potter said the materials should arrive on a September barge and take approximately a week to install – possibly the end of September – but couldn't say for certain as it is a city contract at this point.

• Anvil City Science Academy Sprinkler System – Potter has been told that this funding dependent project could take place at night or possibly during Christmas break.

2012 AYP (Adequate Yearly Progress) results. Unfortunately, proficiency in Language Arts and Math was not met by enough students and not enough progress was made from the past year to meet the goals determined by the federal No Child Left Behind Act at the Elementary and Beltz campuses. However, there were bright spots. Extensions Correspondence, Nome Youth Facility and ACSA all met AYP in 2012. Due to improvement in the subgroup of multi-ethnic students at NBHS, AYP was met in Language Arts. Also, after factoring in fifth year students, AYP graduation rates were met by Beltz and the Nome Youth Facility.

Under action items, the school board approved a cold food contract for $76,000, a two-year Digital Controls Contract for $42,000 and a board policy involving fund balance classifications.

Todd Hindman, ACSA Principal/Teacher submitted a five-year contract between NPS and ACSA beginning with the 2013-2014 school year. Notable changes include NPS committing more rooms to the school, adding a full-time teacher and expanding the enrollment from 44 to 66 students. The board plans to take action on the contract at a special meeting yet to be scheduled.

The Nome Board of Education will next meet in a work session on August 29, 2012.

Flood test showed leak in new hospital

During an intentional flood test on Saturday, August 11, the test pointed out a weak spot in the new hospital's roof. During the flood test, workers discovered spouting water, accumulating a quarter inch deep in the material's manager office on the third floor. The water also flowed into the materials bulk storage room and the hallway, and trickled down the walls onto the offices below in the second and first floor and flooded into the hallway on the third floor.

Assistant project manager Marc Crichton said that the test was conducted on Saturday afternoon when workers blocked the drains on the roof to see if they were tight. They were, but once the drains were opened up again and massive amounts of water rushed through the pipes, a leak caused water to sprinkle into the materials manager's office, on the north side of the third floor. The exact location and nature of the leak is still being investigated and the contractor responsible for the drain installation is to offer an explanation. An insurance adjuster has been onsite to look at the water drain system. Crichton said that the damage was minor and the water was mopped up and dried out with fans. The new carpet in the office showed no water marks. He added that the incident caused no delay to the project schedule and there will be no cost incurred by NSHC.

Panel discusses port's growing pains

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Port of Nome Commission met in regular meeting Aug. 16 to consider user concerns as well as discuss plans for expansion and improvements to keep current business and to court increasing traffic avail-

Newcomers using the port, especially to dredge in gold seeking activities, found insuring their vessels to be difficult. Revised port tariff regulations require vessels with the capability to carry 50 gallons of hazardous material to have proof of insurance. "Availability of inspectors from insurance companies is one of the huge problems right now," miner John Manz said. "We just got hit with this this year, and everyone is trying to comply." So many people are here and have their boats here and there is nobody to inspect," Manz said.

Manz suggested the port schedule an inspector at the beginning of the season to help everyone comply with the rules. "I'm just asking," he said.

"You can ask all you want," Commissioner Jim West, Jr. said.

Harbormaster Joy Baker suggested that vessel owners get together and bring an inspector to Nome. Manz returned with the suggestion that the port include the expense of an inspector's visit in port

"It's been a concern for a lot of people. They're having a hard time trying to comply. Everyone of us has had to struggle with that this year, and maybe some of us haven't been able to do that yet," Manz said.

Baker suggested that dredgers coordinate with fishing boat owners when representatives come to insure fishing boats.

Others attending the meeting wanted to know where to discard dirty bilge water.

Cliff McHenry again pointed out the need for a facility for bilge water "to help keep the waters clean and also shores off the Port of Nome McHenry also mentioned skiffs Brent Tuttle was one who had the issue recently when the U.S. Coast Guard directed him to pump his bilge. (bilge? That's a compartment at the bottom of the boat beneath the soleplate (floor to us lubbers) that collects drops of oil from the engine, water from condensation, rough seas, rain and the like—not a pretty

"I couldn't because it was dirty," Tuttle said. "When the Coast Guard was doing a routine inspection I was told to go back to the harbor and empty the bilge water."

Because there was no facility, "I was faced with a dilemma," he said.

The Coast Guard said, "You may never, ever pump any oil or pollution into the harbor or the ocean. I have been to other harbors was there was a service, he said. "I think it could be a profit center here. I would be glad to pay. The oil that comes from the process, I would think people in Nome would be glad to buy.

Tuttle was able to dispose of his bilge oil with Bonanza Fuel, he said. Tuttle thanked Baker and the port staff for helping him get in and straightened around.

The bilge water issue was new, Baker said, in that the port had not had requests for bilge water disposal. No decision was made.

Mike Benchoff came next. He had accomplished the work orders that the Nome Common Council set out that would allow him to keep his boat in port, except for obtaining insurance and taking the vessel, Rustler, on a half mile round trip out of the harbor to prove it was in running order.

He was running into difficulty getting insurance, he said. Benchoff explained outside the Council meeting that insurance companies did not want to insure dredges and vessels that did not have a conventional make and hull number. He had been trying for several days.

"It's not the run of the mill vessel, it's not an easy thing to do," Benchoff told commissioners.

Why did he start just now looking for insurance. Commissioner Mike Sloan asked. Benchoff responded that the requirement was new in February. He did not know whether he would be able to use the Rustler.

Benchoff has been under fire to correct items on his vessel or be banned forever from using Port of Nome.

Vessels with the capacity for 50 gallons of hazardous substances must have proof of insurance to use the port.

Benchoff asked Baker for certificates on file showing that all boats in the class had insurance.

Port commissioners arrived at consensus among themselves that Benchoff could not examine the certificates, as it would violate business privacy of other boat owners.

However, when the Nugget consulted press attorney John McKay for clarification, McKay said state open records law allowed the Nugget or any citizen to inspect the insurance certificates and ask for selected or all copies of the insurance certifi-

Baker offered to tell Benchoff who had insurance.

"I am asking to make sure the tariff is being applied fairly and across the board," Benchoff replied.

"I think the City would be in a defensible position to say they are insured or not insured, but giving out carriers and certificates, that's private business," Charlie Lean said.

'Couldn't you just go up to their boats and ask them, instead of coming around to us," commissioner Jim West Jr. said.

A few folks have asked about insurance and port staff has given them a list and their phone numbers, Baker

The commission said Benchoff could get a list of insurance companies and a list of the boats that are insured. He was willing to get insurance to satisfy the port's reauirements.

Meanwhile, Baker said the port was hosting around 150 vessels. The port staff is working to expand area and services.

"Getting the middle dock in is critical, to serve vessels without having them wait too long, and encouraging them to go elsewhere," Baker

The port has FEMA emergency money, but it may only be used to restore damages to the port facility. The FEMA money cannot go for improvements.

The Port Commission was to meet with the Council in a scheduled work session Wednesday, Aug.22, to discuss port improvements and expansion priorities.

A bond issue for port money will come before the voters statewide soon, which, if passed, would provide Nome's port a share of $10 mil-

A port customer asked to store ammonium nitrate, an explosive, at the port for 48 hours before it was loaded. The port declined, as the tariff and safety considerations bar storage of explosives. Such hazardous materials may be transported across the port, under special procedures with the Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. personnel standing by at the port.

The commission will get a resolution underway to prohibit storage of explosives at the facility for any

Legislator proposes creation of Alaska Arctic Port and Development Authority

By Laurie McNicholas

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and Alaska Dept. of Transportation are studying a number of potential sites from Bethel to Barrow for a deep water Arctic port because vessel traffic through the Bering Strait is increasing as summer sea ice shrinks and offshore oil and gas exploration takes shape in the Chukchi and Beaufort seas.

State and federal congressional leaders see a need for a deep draft Arctic port in Alaska to maintain sovereignty, diversify the state's economy, meet Arctic search and rescue responsibilities and protect U.S. air, land and sea borders

The City of Nome is seeking to expand its current port to a deep draft port, while the City of Kotzebue is working to develop a deep water port at Cape Blossom and a 10-mile access road from Kotzebue to Cape Blossom. Port Clarence, located west of Teller on the Seward Peninsula and formerly the site of a Coast Guard LORAN facility, has a natural deep water port. Last month the Coast Guard set up an aviation base at Barrow with Jayhawk helicopters and support teams to respond to incidents in the Chukchi and Beaufort seas from July to October.

Port authority proposed

Rep. Bob Herron of Bethel has developed draft legislation for a proposed Alaska Arctic Port and Development Authority as a possible way to depoliticize site selection for an Arctic deep water port. The draft bill was among major topics at the Bering Strait Management Authority workshop held Aug. 16 in Anchorage during the second annual "Week of the Arctic" sponsored by the Institute of the North. ION Executive Director Nils Andreassen described the workshop as a data gathering session, not a formal part of state or federal processes. "Be creative and get into the subject," he told the 50 or so workshop participants.

The draft bill Herron plans to introduce in the next session of the Alaska Legislature would create an Alaska Arctic Port and Development Authority to devise a comprehensive plan for a regional system of ports, including a deep water port and related facilities in consultation with federal, state and private institutions. "Rather than developing a port here and a port there, a holistic plan to maximize efficiencies of the entire port system in Alaska's Arctic could be formulated," Herron wrote in an Institute of the North article titled, "Empowering Alaska as America's Arctic."

The authority envisioned in the draft bill would be a public corporation of the state in the Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development, but with a separate and independent legal existence.

to provide funds to construct, develop and improve ports, including deep water ports and related infrastructure in Arctic Alaska. The legislation would define the purposes and powers of the authority, and establish the Alaska Arctic Port and Development Authority revolving

The governor would appoint nine public members of the authority, four of whom would be from the Alaska Arctic coastal region. Members would serve at the pleasure of the governor for two-year terms. Each member would possess expertise in private sector business or industry and leadership skills

Herron told workshop participants the proposed legislation is an early draft and may not be the same as the bill he introduces in the Alaska Legislature in January 2013. He also noted that a bill could become Heinz's "57 Varieties" as it goes through the legislative process.

'I'm not trying to make a new AIEDA (Alaska Industrial Development and Export Authority) here, Herron added. He said Alaska needs a port authority approved by the governor to put in place a mechanism for a system of ports in the Bering Sea. "The Bering Sea is so important to the Arctic, and just as important to the people of the Yukon and Kuskokwim rivers," he said.

Arctic ports study update

Lorraine Cordova, project manager for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, said the scope of work is two-thirds complete for an Alaska Deep Draft Arctic Ports Study by the Corps and the Alaska Dept. of Transportation to evaluate potential deepwater port locations. She said all sites in the study would be ranked by the end of this year. Detailed site investigations will take place in 2013 and 2014.

Cordova said the federal government is not in a position to fund an Arctic deepwater port, so Public Private Partnerships (PPPs) are needed to champion the project and move it forward. Workshop participants received a fact sheet describing how PPPs are structured in many countries to finance capital projects such as ports and harbors.

'Planning for a port PPP [in Alaska] should involve Community Development Quota groups, Alaska Native regional and village corporations as well as shipping companies," the fact sheet reads. "Alaska Native corporations may not want to fund all aspects of the port, however they should still be involved with the marine services and employee training. If PPP is applied to building a deepwater port to transport oil from Alaska, safety and environmental concerns must also be addressed."

Participants tackle questions

Workshop participants formed small groups to address these ques-

• How do we define effective communications within the region, between the region and state/federal agencies, and across the border?

- · What roles are there for stakeholders and what structure supports governance of those roles?
- · Are there clearly delineated responsibilities outlined for stakeholders and governance?

Several workshop participants emphasized a need to work collaboratively with Russia to address vessel traffic growth in the Bering Workshop participants included Lieutenant Governor Mead Treadwell; Commissioner Susan Bell, Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development; Commissioner Larry Hartig, Dept. of Environmental Conservation; Deputy Commissioner Craig Fleener, Alaska Dept. of Fish & Game; Unalaska Mayor Shirley Marquardt, Nome Mayor Denise Michels, representatives of the Coast Guard and Army Corps of Engineers, University of Alaska faculty members; Myron Nenang, president, Association of Village Council Presidents; Elizabeth Moore, NANA Regional Corp.; Matt Ganley, vice president of resources and external affairs, Bering Straits Native Corp.; Norm Stadem, an economist formerly with Kawerak, Inc., who has worked on numerous economic development plans in the Bering Strait region; and Vikki Hykes-Steere, who is from Unalakleet, has an LLM in environmental law and is a professor at Alaska Pacific University.

The Red Dog, a zinc-lead mine located near Kotzebue, is one of the world's largest producers of zinc concentrate. The mine was developed in 1989 under an operating agreement between the NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., and Teck Alaska Incorporated, a U.S. subsidiary of Teck Resources Limited, a diversified mining company headquartered in Vancouver, headquartered Canada.

Man wrestles grizzly, saves brother's life

By Diana Haecker

It was supposed to be a hunting trip to Cape Espenberg, a trip where a father is teaching his sons how he's been taught, in the ways of subsistence hunting. The lessons, though, went far beyond tracking caribou and bringing home the meat.

The lessons, after the shock wore off, were about bravery and courage and the deep love for life and family that only a near-death encounter can

Raymond Weyiouanna, 43, his two sons Lynden, 14, and Gordon, 11, as well as his brother Dave Weyiouanna, 38, left Shishmaref for a hunting trip on Sunday, August 12. Off they went in their boat up the Espenberg River, about 69 miles west of Cape Espenberg. They reached their destination, a reindeer camp. and stayed overnight. The next morning, they spotted caribou up on the hillside, but their dog barked and spooked the caribou. No biggy, said Raymond W., we'll just drive up the river a little ways and try to find them there. The hunting party got into the boat and drove about nine miles when they hit a sandbar and started to get out of the boat. At that moment, time sped up to lightning speed. "Right after we hit the sandbar, I saw a brown bear crashing out of the willows, charging us," said Raymond Weyiouanna. "My brother had a loaded gun in his hand but the bear made it to the boat and swatted the rifle out of my brothers hands, it fell into the river." Weyiouanna said the bear had his brother in a bear hug, biting and mauling him, half in the boat, half on the beach. Sons Lynden and Gordon, were standing outside the boat, frozen in fear, watching in horror what happened. The bear started to pull Dave outside the boat, trying to drag him into the river, when Raymond realized that the other gun was about eight feet away from him and unreachable. "I would've lost too much time, if I were to go over and grab it," he said. Raymond jumped on the bear and wrestled the angry animal with all he had. "Without thinking, I found myself wrestling the bear and getting it off Dave," Raymond told The Nome Nugget. "I didn't even have time to get the knife out of the sheath," pointing to his belt. He managed to get the bear off his brother and out of the boat, but now the grizzly had him in a tight bear hug and started mauling him. This allowed the brother to get up and both grown ups started to yell. "We started hollering like crazy," said Raymond. Startled, the bear let go of Raymond and took off running back into the willows. In the meantime, Dave managed to get the gun and fired a shot after the bear. Bleeding from the head, torso and arms, Raymond got into the boat and began revving the engine to scare the bear off further. In the fight, the bear tore off the radio antenna and smashed the radio, so they couldn't communicate their predicament to their family in Shishmaref. They piled back into the boat, sped down the river and made it back to their camp at the reindeer corral. "We took our clothes off and checked our wounds," Raymond W. said. His brother had a bite wound through his left arm, the ribs were punctured and he had bite wounds on his left shoulder. Raymond's injuries were to his head, where the bear nearly tore off his right ear and bite wounds on his right arm. "We dressed our wounds with paper towels and duct tape and then went on to Shishmaref," Raymond said. Shook up from the bear attack, all four had then to battle angry seas when the weather got bad and the remaining 20 miles to Shishmaref along the coast turned into a rough trip. A spare radio stowed them hope that maybe it would work. even though the antenna was out of commission. "985 Oceanview, can anybody in Shishmaref hear me?" The call was answered. "Go ahead, Ray," came Weyiouanna's other brother's voice from Shishmaref. Ray instructed him to get the health aides ready, they'd been attacked by a bear and needed stitches. "Then I started getting weak from the loss of blood, and my sons helped me to stay awake," said Raymond. They arrived in Shishmaref, where their wounds were tended to, but their souls needed a couple of days to come out of the trauma. "I'm not a rich man," Raymond W. said slowly. "I live a simple life. I am on public assistance, but I do live off the land and the sea. I was teaching my sons how to live off the sea and the land. After we made it home, I couldn't believe we were still alive. I couldn't believe I was home with my seven children again. I was so sure we were going to be killed there, and that I was not going to see my wife and children and my parents ever again," Weyiouanna said, clearly still shaken up.

The two boys were physically unharmed, but still have flashbacks of the big bear's head and the jaws widen open. The Weyiouanna brothers were treated for their injuries and released. They still can't believe that they lived to tell the tale.

Runners compete despite cold, rain

By Jeff Collins, XC running coach NBHS

Bill Bowerman, University of Oregon's renowned distance coach, would tell his runners that, "There is no such thing as bad weather, just soft people." This theory was tested on Saturday in Nome as runners competed in heavy wind, downpour rain and cold temperatures. It was a perfect morning to sit in, have a cup of coffee, relax on the couch or stay warm in bed, unless you are the Nome-Beltz Cross Country team. Twenty-four of NBXC's finest runners and eight tough members of the community headed out on the roads to complete an eight-mile loop around town, each with a smile on their face - at times. They ran in teams of four, two, or for some, on their own. This was a group Mr. Bowerman would have been proud held every year at the Elementary School at the beginning of the crosscountry running season. It is the largest fundraiser for the Nome-Beltz Nanook harriers and this year, the community of Nome helped them raise a generous amount. As with every sport in Nome, a portion of in-district travel is covered by the school district, but all out-of-district travel is covered by the fundraising efforts of the student athletes.

The Nome-Beltz 8-Mile-Relay is

The runners in Nome are among the most competitive and toughest athletes in the state, largely due to the environment we train in and the community that supports us. Nome has produced a Region Championship team every year for the past five years. Last year was a double win with both the boys and girls team earning the title of Region 1 North Team Champions. This year looks to be a repeat of last year's performance and the success of the program and support of the community has helped the numbers in cross country swell. Nome boasts nearly forty runners this year.

The team thanks the community of Nome for their continued support, Leo Rasmussen, Crystal Tobuk, the CAMP department and the Rotary Club for helping spread the love of running and developing a community where runners can survive and race. Our children are strong, healthy and with a community like Nome to support them, they will be of a mid-August fisheries update issued Aug. 17 by Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue, Alaska Dept. of Fish and High water continued to cause problems with salmon escapement counting projects in Norton Sound last week. The Nome River and Snake River weirs were knocked out by high water early in the morning of Aug. 16, the Kwiniuk tower crew has been unable to count since the evening of Aug. 16, and the Niukluk tower crew has been unable to count since the early morning hours of Aug. 17. The İnglutalik tower crew reports poor visibility and marginal counting conditions. All escapement counts should be considered minimum counts.

Poor weather conditions kept fishermen on the beach. The commercial salmon harvest by 115 permit holders totaled 60,000 chums, 203,000 pinks, 95 sockeyes and 25,000 silvers in mid-August.

Commercial salmon fishing is

Following is a condensed version open weekly from 6 p.m. Sunday to 6 one week longer than last year. p.m. Tuesday and from 6 p.m. Wednesday to 6 p.m. Friday through Sept. 7 in the Unalakleet and Shaktoolik subdistricts. The Unalakleet subdistrict harvest totals 27,625 chums, 50,400 pinks, 55 sockeyes and 14,000 silvers by 50 permit holders. The cumulative harvest in the Shaktoolik subdistrict totals 20,000 chums, 19,480 pinks, 25 sockeyes and 6,000 silvers by 20 permit hold-

The Unalakleet River test fish project reports catches of 26 kings, 1,404 chums, 573 pinks, 1 sockeye and 150 silvers through Aug. 16. The silver catch ranks 11th out of 28 years.

The North River tower cumulative counts through Aug. 16 were 996 kings, 8,873 chums, 147,616 pinks and 2,916 silvers. High and murky water caused some counting problems, but the project is operational. The silver salmon counts rank 11th out of 14 years for this date.

The Unalakleet River floating weir project ended for the season on Cumulative counts were 776 kings, 73,776 chums, 687,044 pinks, 241 sockeyes and 15,394 silvers. The project counted Cumulative passage at the Shaktoolik sonar project through July 30 is estimated at 482,000 salmon, with apportionment of kings, 43,000 chums, 430,000 pinks and 8,000 silvers.

Norton Bay subdistrict

Commercial salmon fishing is open weekly from 6 p.m. Sunday to 6 p.m. Tuesday and from 6 p.m. Wednesday to 6 p.m. Friday through September 7. The commercial harvest by 17 permit holders totals 8,400 chums, 50,000 pinks, 15 sockeyes and 4,200 silvers.

Inglutalik River tower-Cumulative counts through Aug. 16 were 1,146 kings, 32,056 chums, 86,958 pinks, and 1,020 silvers. This is the second year of the project. Last year, counting ended on Aug. 7 with final counts of 1,468 kings, 61,443 chums, 450,283 pinks and 519 silvers. High, murky water has caused some counting problems, but the project is operational.

Elim subdistrict

The next scheduled commercial fishing period is from 6 p.m. Saturday, Aug. 25 to 6 p.m. Monday, Aug. 27. The cumulative commercial harvest by 19 permit holders is 2,160 chums, 52,725 pinks and 450 silvers. An early season aerial survey counted 2,889 silvers in the Tubutulik River and 261 silvers in Kwiniuk River. In most years the Kwiniuk and Tubutulik track similarly, but this year local fishermen reported a blockage to the slough connecting the Kwiniuk River to Kwiniuk Inlet.

Kwiniuk River tower-Cumulative counts through Aug. 16 were 36 kings, 5,499 chums, 381,585 pinks and 770 silvers. Silver counts are trailing all years. The average midpoint past the tower is Aug. 19.

Golovin subdistrict

The next scheduled commercial fishing period is from 6 p.m. Friday, Aug. 24 to 6 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 26.

The cumulative harvest by 13 permit holders is 3,800 chums, 31,225 pinks and 500 silvers. An aerial survey counted double the number of silvers the tower crew had counted, which indicates good silver passage in the week the tower project was down.

Niukluk River tower-Cumulative counts through Aug. 16 are 21 kings, 19,672 chums, 249,326 pinks and 1,708 silvers. Silver counts rank 9th out of 17 years for this date. The average midpoint past the tower is Aug.

Nome subdistrict

Subsistence set gillnetting is open 7 days a week in the marine waters, and the fresh water subsistence area schedule is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday.

Nome River weir-Cumulative counts through Aug. 15 are 6 kings, 1,982 chums, 148,813 pinks, 41 sockeyes and 224 silvers. Silver counts rank 11th out of 18 years. The average first quarter point past the weir is Aug. 21.

Snake River weir-Cumulative counts through Aug. 15 are 651 chums, 6,119 pinks, 1 sockeye and 14 silvers. Silver counts rank 16th out of 18 years. The average first quarter point past the weir is Aug. 22.

Port Clarence district

The Pilgrim River weir escapement goal (aerial survey at Salmon Lake and Grand Central tributary to Salmon Lake) is 4,000 to 8,000 sockeve. Cumulative counts through Aug. 16 were 58 kings, 24,079 chums, 46,112 pinks and 7,076 sock-

An aerial survey count of 3,700 sockeye salmon in Salmon Lake and Grand Central River occurred on Aug. 9. The survey was fair/poor with difficulty seeing sockeye in the deep pools at the mouth of Grand Central River. The weir count through Aug. 9 was 6,694, and the average daily count since has been 50 sockeye, so the goal is expected to be reached if we ever get decent weather to aerial survey.

Kotzebue district

The cumulative commercial catch of 214,000 chum salmon by 79 permit holders is on track to reach or exceed the preseason harvest forecast of 250,000 to 280,000 chums.

The ADF&G Kobuk River test fish project is now complete, because high water carrying trees out of the Squirrel River is creating hazardous conditions for boating. Cumulative catches at the project through Aug. 16 were 2,114 chums, 5 pinks, 326 sheefish, 2 pike, 2 burbot, 3 suckers and 4 whitefish. The cumulative catch index for chum salmon ranked 3rd best in the 20-year project history, but because the project was a week shorter this year, the catch index likely would have been a record.

Crab harvest nears end

The open access portion of the Norton Sound summer commercial red king crab fishery closed on Aug. 11. The harvest of 441,080 pounds by 29 permit holders was more than 10,000 pounds above the guideline harvest level of 430,540 pounds. The value of the open access harvest was a record $2.4 million dollars.

Less than half of the Community Development Quota (34,910 pounds of crab) allocated to Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. remains to be caught. If the entire CDQ allocation is harvested, the final 2012 catch will total nearly 476,000 pounds and will be 4,000 pounds below the allowable biological catch of 480,000 pounds, so no reduced harvest penalty will be assessed for next year's commercial

Baby boomers should be tested for Hepatitis C according to CDC

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Adults born between 1945 and 1965 should receive a one-time screening test for hepatitis C according to new recommendations made last week by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The number of people in the United States with the Hepatitis C Virus (HCV) is increasing. Alaska is no exception. Epidemiology experts reported 964 cases of HCV in Alaska in 2011, up from 366 cases in 1996.

Nationwide, two-thirds of the people newly diagnosed with HCV and 73 percent of the people who die from HCV were born between 1945-1965, which is why the CDC has targeted this age group for testing.

HCV is a silent killer. Unlike other forms of hepatitis including Hepatitis A or Hepatitis B, a person with HCV may carry the virus for decades, passing the infection to others long before symptoms develop.

The Hepatitis C virus circulates in the blood stream specifically infecting the cells of the liver. Inside the liver, HCV causes damage leading to two of the most feared complications of HCV infection: cirrhosis of the liver, and a liver cancer known as hepatocellular carcinoma. HCV is the leading cause of liver cancer and the leading cause of liver disease requiring transplant in the United States.

About two out of every ten people with untreated HCV will develop liver cancer. The risk is highest in people with HCV who drink alcohol.

There are many ways people catch the hepatitis C virus. Anyone who received a blood transfusion prior to 1992, when regulations were instituted for blood screening for HCV, is at risk. Many new cases occur in people who have had multiple sexual partners or those who have shared needles to inject illicit drugs or, similarly, people who have shared needles used to tattoo the skin. People who snort cocaine are also at increased risk.

Only 55 percent of people diagnosed with HCV have one of these risk factors according to the CDC. Experts are investigating other causes of HCV transmission to explain infection in the other 45 percent of persons with HCV.

Treatment for HCV can prevent cirrhosis, liver cancer, and transmission of the virus to others. Current treatments require a person to take specific antiviral medications for 6-12 months. People undergoing treatment must abstain from alcohol and other substances that affect the liver.

Prevention of HCV is important because there is no vaccine available to prevent HCV. Health care providers and people coming in contact with body fluids should use universal precautions when handling objects contaminated with any blood, saliva, or urine since HCV or other infectious agents may be present.

Universal precautions include wearing examination gloves and using eye protection to prevent exposure when handling or cleaning up body fluids.

The CDC recommends one-time screening for all adults ages 47-67 who have not previously been screened. Screening involves a simple blood test and may be added to an annual blood draw. Diagnosing HCV early is important because alcohol cessation followed by proper treatment can be lifesaving.

If you were born between 1945 and 1965 and have never been tested for Hepatitis C, consider speaking with your doctor about screening options at your next annual exam.

THE DOCK WALK

By Diana Haecker

Last week was one continuous rain storm, preventing dredgers to go to work for the most part and barges trying to make it into the harbor ended up "jogging" several days in front of Nome before being able to make landfall.

The National Weather Service reports that Nome broke a rain record with 1.06 inches of rain for Saturday, August 18, besting the 1973 record of .95 inches for that day. Winds kicked up waves enough to be a problem between last Wednesday and Saturday, when fishing boats and gold dredges huddled in the harbor and Snake River, staying out of the weather. Harbor master Joy Baker reports that three research boats, including the Norseman II came into the harbor to resupply, reprovision and give the crew some R&R. Before the stormy weather arrived, a gravel barge and freight barge made it into the Port to discharge and load. During the storm, a gravel barge and a freight barge were "jogging"- a term used to describe them cruising up and down the coast to wait out the weather - since Wednesday and finally were able to pull into the harbor on Sunday and Monday.

The U.S. Coast Guard cutter

Munro was anchored offshore and left on Thursday. The U.S. Coast Guard cutter Sycamore arrived at the dock on Sunday, offering their sailors shore leave before they left on Monday.

On Tuesday, the German cruise liner Hanseatic arrived in Nome and about 140 German tourists came onshore to participate in a land tour with gold panning and a dog mushing presentation. On Friday, as the weather really turned for the bad with constant wind-driven rain, the cruise ship The World anchored outside of the Port of Nome and shuttled passengers in to participate in a land tour.

The World went on to Kotzebue, where they picked up 20 pallets worth of groceries that were scheduled to be delivered in Nome. Due to the runway closure and bad weather, the groceries never made it to Nome.

Another addition to the port property is a fence alongside Seppala Drive. Baker explained that the new chainlink fence has been erected to keep debris and stored items from interfering with traffic along Seppala Drive. "It was an operational decision to keep the harbor parking area organized, contained and to increase vehicle safety," Baker said.

Dear Nancy,

I was wondering if you've had a chance to listen to the NSEDC Fisheries Development Committee meeting that was held on July 31 at the Bering Straits Native Corporation Board Room on YouTube. should if you haven't already.

I attended that meeting with Tim, and, I also listened to the recording several times. It is an accurate recording of what I saw and, heard up until the time when Tim was kicked out of the meeting. I've attended many NSEDC meetings in the past 20 years and not once have they provided me with the "NSEDC's protocols" that Janis Ivanoff refers to in her August 9 letter to the editor.

In fact, I am very alarmed by the information in the letter written to you from Janis Ivanoff, the President/CEO of NSEDC in the August 9 issue of your newspaper. It's full of accusations, many of which are not true and/or a misrepresentation of the facts. Tim did not disrupt the meeting as Janis claims. It was Kyan Ōlanna, NSEDC staff member, who interrupted Jim Menard and asked Oscar Takak to call for a ten minute break. It's very clear on the YouTube tape posting.

The section on the recording that is very alarming to me is where Kyan is heard to say "back off". I had stopped taking notes for the members of the Nome Fishermen's Association and started watching the drama unfold at the board room table as soon as I heard the call for the ten minute break. Kyan's interaction with Tim was very disruptive and you can hear Tim trying to reason with her on the recording. She was trying to provoke him to react to her rude demands with a lot of

When the break was called, I knew they were going to call the police so I was not surprised when the policeman arrived and asked Tim to speak to him in the hallway. He went willingly. I followed shortly after. What's not noted in the story is that I was ordered to leave the premises with Tim. So, I was also "expelled" from attending the rest of NSEDC's Public Meeting on July 31, 2012.

I'd like to refer to your Editorial piece in the August 2, 2012 issue of your paper. NSEDC is funded with Public Monies given to our region from the Federal Government. We have a right to voice our opinions to their governing body. In fact, your editorial encourages us to do just that! Your closing comment fits this situation perfectly, "Tyranny feeds on ignorance, and an informed public keeps the lamp of liberty beaming." The truth in any situation protects us from "tyranny". I'm sure you agree.

Sincerely, Rita Smith Nome, Alaska

Dear Editor & Residents of the North West Coast, How strongly do you believe in

Today through August 28 VOTE

YES ON 2! I urge all Alaskans to vote Yes on Ballot Measure 2 this week to help keep the future of our coastal lands and waters in the hands of Alaska's citizens. It is in our best interests to restore Alaska's Coastal Management Program. In 1976,

Governor Hammond proposed a coastal management program for Alaska so that Alaskans would have a voice in managing our coasts as new development occurred. Alaska's coastal program protected our precious coastline and way of life successfully for over 30 years; It is supported by well-respected

Alaskans, including Alaska Senate

President Gary Stevens (Kodiak),

Former State Senator Arliss Stur-

gulewski (Anchorage), Representative Bryce Edgmon (Dillingham), and Former Mayor and past Permanent Fund CEO and AFN President

Byron Mallott (Juneau/Yakutat); It allows local citizens to have a voice in what happens to our coastal lands, waters, and those that inhabit them;

It provides a "one stop shop" for those who wish to develop to help them figure out the complicated permitting processes required for development. Alaska has more coastline than any other state in the nation yet right now it is the only coastal state without a coastal management program. We had such a program successfully for 30 years. The Coastal

Zone Management Act uniquely requires the federal government to follow what the state and local citizens decide; In 2011, the Legislature and the governor failed to agree on conditions for extending Alaska's coastal program and the program expired;

Through Ballot Measure 2, we now have a chance to regain our influence in federal government decisions

your right to have a say about what goes on in your community? My impression is: pretty strongly!

We elect mayors, city council members, school board members, etc. so that we KNOW about and can participate in local decisions, which affect our personal lives where we live. All for the continued good and the betterment of our communities.

Would you, as citizens, relinquish that ability and right? "NEVER",

Well, the big foreign-owned oil and gas companies, the big foreignowned diamond companies, the big foreign-owned gold and silver mining companies and now the big foreign-owned rare earth mineral mining companies want you to do just that! They say, "Trust us. We know better than you who live here what is good for you!"

These huge international companies don't want to allow You to have a say when or where they want to drill and mine in YOUR backyard {or front yard, for that matter}.

That's it! Bottom Line! That's exactly what Proposition 2 on the August Primary ballot is all about: RE-ESTABLISHING COASTAL ZONE MANAGEMENT, which allows us to have a voice in development decisions in our communities!

Vote YES on Proposition 2 and regain your right to control the air you breathe, the water you drink, the fish, wildlife, plants your depend on for both sustenance and lifestyle. By voting YES you will/we will regain the right to demand that development of OUR resources is done responsibly and with respect to what we hold dear, to what we need, to what we want our children and generations to be able to cherish and use.

Vote NO and you/we will lose our voices and will turn over our communities to the BIG Internationals which care only about their PROF-ITS. Not for the well-being of real people. Remember that WE are Citizen Owners of OUR resources.

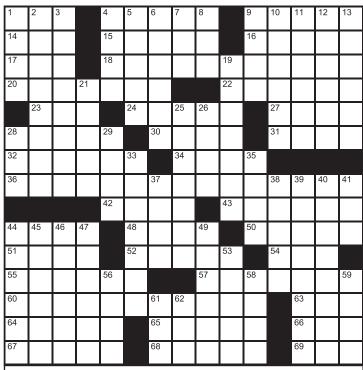

Rural Alaska has all the resources. Those resources are coveted by the international companies. Make them pay attention to US. Vote YES on Proposition 2 on

Leonard Piitkaq Apangalook Leonard Piitkaq Apangalook was born to John and Lily Apangalook on June 14, 1939. Although we will miss him, he went to be with the Lord on June 12, 2012. Leonard was raised in a loving Christian

Leonard Piitkaq Apangalook

During his early childhood, it was evident that Leonard was a natural hunter and like his father John had a keen interest in weather conditions and observations.

In 1954, Leonard left Gambell to attend Mt. Edgecumbe High School in Sitka. While a junior there, he enlisted in the National Guard. In 1958 during his senior year, he met Mildred Reese from Yakutat, and on June 28, 1960 they were joined in Holy Matrimony. They had a loving marriage of 52 years and together raised six children and had 17 grandchildren. Leonard was a loving husband, father, grandfather, uncle, brother, and son. He led and provided for his entire family with a reassuring, gentle positive way. During his lifetime, Leonard held many capacities and had many accomplishments and achievements.

Nome, AK.

First, he served 15 years in the National Guard becoming a commissioned officer. He went on to become Commander of a Special Forces A Team with the rank of Captain. He had also reached Jump Master status in the Airborne Unit.

Nineteen sixty-two was a very busy and significant year for Leonard. Not only did he join the military, he was two years into fatherhood as well. He was hired to be the magistrate in Gambell by the Supreme Court and a day later, hired by the IRA Council to be the store manager. He enjoyed his work very much. On the side for close to 30 years as the store manager. He enjoyed his work very much. One the side for shorter stints he served as village commissioner of the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission for five years. During which him and Millie traveled internationally. Leonard served as a board member for Sivuqaq Inc. and the Selective Service for several years as well. Although he held many titles,

Besides being an avid reader, some of his hobbies include camping, fishing, reloading, and collecting weather data and studying environmental changes. The thing he enjoyed the most though, was spending time with his family and

In 2008 Leonard and Millie moved to Anchorage due to medical reasons. Through his health issues, Leonard carried himself with God's grace. Never once did he complain. Instead he confronted us with his reassuring and steadfast faith in God. We came to depend on his steady footsteps.

During their four-year stay in Anchorage, Leonard and Millie welcomed many people to their home where they shared food, laughter, and good times. This, they enjoyed immensely!

Leonard is survived by his wife Millie, daughters Darlene, Barbara and Pamela; sons Leonard Jr. and wife Jarraine, Ron and wife Carolyn; and Ross; brothers and their wives, Preston and Alvina, Paul and Charlene; sisters Susan and Terry. He is also survived by his many grandchildren, nephews and nieces who loved him very much.

Our other loved ones that went to be with our Lord before Leonard were his parents John and Lily, brothers Rudy, Percy, Merle, Daniel, and Michael; sisters Otilia and Luceen.

While Leonard will be sorely missed, may his loving memory live on forever in our hearts.

Saying It Sincerely

By Rev. Julia Voder Elmore Pastor of Community United Methodist Church and member of the Nome Ministerial Association Scripture Reference: Mark 6:30-32

Well, here we are at the beginning of a new school year. If you or your student has not begun classes yet, the day is coming soon. The beginning of a new school year means a flurry of activities - getting up earlier and going to bed earlier, packing lunches, homework, extracurricular activities, spelling tests, reading logs, math quizzes, more laundry, wearing warmer clothes, etc. The busyness of it all can be exciting and rewarding, yet at the same time overwhelming and draining if we are not careful. Where is the time to get centered in the midst of all this activity??

The disciples were also very busy people back in the day. Jesus had sent them out two by two to various communities to teach, heal and cast out demons. Although they were very excited about what they were doing, the disciples became drained of their energy over time, especially if some were too busy to eat! When they had all gathered to report back to Jesus about their missions I imagine they were all talking a mile a minute about their experiences - the good, the bad and the ugly. After hearing them, Jesus called them to go with him to a deserted place so that they could have a time of Sabbath rest and eat together.

In the midst of our busy days, it is important to take time for Sabbath rest and reconnection with God. It is easy to go and go and go and push and push and push and sooner or later we find ourselves burned out by all the demands of our days. It is not easy, but taking time away with God helps to fill us up and refreshes us. Ideally, we would dedicate a whole day to spending time with God and getting renewed. As many of us know, this is not always possible, as would be confirmed if we read further in Mark 6:33-42. People have needs - our kids, our family, our friends, and our community. Yet still in the midst of these interruptions, God calls us away to a deserted place. This time away could be when we first wake up in the morning, at noon over lunch, or in the evening as our day is winding down.

May you find time in this busy season of the year to connect with God and be refreshed anew to do all that you are called to do.

Alaskans own Alaska.

It is our right to have a say in coastal decisions.

Firefighters douse blaze in Alaska Gold Dredge #6

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. saved one of Nome's famous landmarks and navigational aids over the weekend.

NVFD responded twice to put out a fire on the historic Alaska Gold Dredge 6 near West Beach Saturday evening and again Sunday when smolder tried to turn up the flame

Dredge 6, tall and visible from distances on land and sea, along with Nome's other famous landmark, historic White Alice repeater antennas at Anvil Mountain, helps airplane pilots, boaters, snowmachiners and hikers find their way.

The fire lighted up only a small area at the bottom floor of the dredge in the trommel area — a screened, rotating cylinder that sorts ore maybe a 10 feet by 10 feet, according to NVFD Chief Matt Johnson. Grease, rubber belts and other petroleum products made the black smoke that rolled out of the bottom of the dredge Saturday evening and also escaped from the top.

Nevertheless, fighting the fire was tricky and dangerous, Johnson said. Firefighters used water and special foam for fighting petroleum-fed

'We tell our guys 'we aren't going to kill a firefighter just to put a dredge out," Johnson said. "Just accessing the building was the hardest part. We were dealing with a lot of machinery and old stuff, extremely unsafe conditions in a dredge more than 80 years old and nothing done to it in 20 years.

"We tried to use a master stream directly from the truck, but we ran out of water so quick it wasn't funny. We have pumps that pull 400 gallons a minute, but that truck holds 1,500 gallons, so we pumped that thing dry in a minute and a half. We sent five guys in there with two hand lines (water hoses).

'The fire was so deep-seated and we had water issues Saturday night," Johnson said, explaining the return trip to douse the dredge Sunday.

Johnson explained that the department's new fire truck uses a large volume of water with powerful pumps and empties quickly unless it is attached to a hydrant or two. "We went back Sunday with a Honda pump and ran a line directly off the dredge into the trommel area and just

Statoil plans oil exploration in Chukchi Sea as early as 2015

By Diana Haecker

A delegation of Statoil representatives came on Nome last Monday for a community meeting and to inform the Nome public about their plans to drill exploratory wells at their offshore leases in the Chukchi

pany headquartered in Norway, operates in 36 countries and in 2009 they opened an Anchorage office with the intent to explore for oil in the Arctic. Statoil bought federal offshore leases in the Chukchi Sea in 2008. The Amundsen and Augustine leases are located 113 miles northwest of Wainright and about 156 miles Westnorthwest from Barrow.

The meeting drew about 40 Nome residents plus Senator Donny Olson and his wife Willow to the Mini Convention Center, who came to hear Statoil's plans, eat dinner and get some door prizes. The set up was complete with a buffet of fried rice, chicken and beef dishes, finger foods, sushi, salads and desserts. The tables were set with white linens, decorative artificial flowers, cloth napkins and silver ware. Alaska Native ladies from Barrow, now residing in Anchorage and being in Statoil's employ, signed in guests and three Inupiaq interpreters were on hand in the eventuality that an Elder needs translation. Also, a professional photographer brought in from Anchorage roamed the meeting venue, taking photos of presenters and listeners alike.

Lars Sunde, Statoil's Alaska exploration manager, began his power point presentation reiterating that Alaska's Arctic is an important emerging area for oil and gas explorers and that this fact isn't lost on Statoil. "We feel that with our technological expertise and knowledge we are a good fit for Alaska," Sunde said. The Arctic warming trend is opening access to significant resources of energy and oil companies are jockeying for position to jump on the opportunity. Experts es-

City needs help in spending $200,000

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council danced a light agenda Monday night, stopping briefly over a contract to paint Old St. Joe's, missing pull tab game reports, a new liquor license and the opportunity to spend Nome's $200,000 annual community share from NSEDC.

The council tabled a bid to paint Old St. Joe's Hall meeting house pending more information and a 'running it by" the City's contract architect, Terry Hyer.

Jared L. Miller, the sole member of PLS Construction, submitted a base bid for $91,000, plus $13,000 for work on the bell tower, the only bid response, according to City staff.

Several people took the podium during public comment to make suggestions on the spending of the annual community share from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. Dear Editor,

In regards to what has been going on with the Kakaruk Herd. My name is Frank Lee one of the owners of the Kakaruk Herd. As far as Lam concerned the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Reindeer Herders Association did what they thought was right for the interest of the herd and all the owners of the Kakaruk Herd. For years I have pushed to have the last manger taken off because of the lack of communication to the owners, B.I.A., R.H.A., and any other agency that is involved with the reindeer industry. Yes, I am not happy with how BIA or RHA decided to put Tom Gray as the manager without giving ay notice to any of the Kakaruk herd owners. At this time BIA and RHA needed to put a manger in place so that all the paper work can be processed n order to keep the herd in it's current location and to me that is just cause for the way they handled

I may be in prison but I still have rights in regards to who decides on the management of the Kakaruk herd, and I will voice in that right. Now, to all the people of Teller I am sorry for the way the herd has been run for the last five years and I want you to know I will be sure to let the next manger know what the Kakaruk herd means to us as a people and community. Our people been herding reindeer for a very long time and waste of public money.

I'd like to see this tradition continue for future generations.

Please have a little patience with us and let this process continue it's course so we can put in a manger so well all can enjoy once again the round-up season and butchering season.

Sincerely, Frank Lee, Co-owner Frank Lee #277321 Hudson Correctional Center Facility 3001 N. Juniper Street Hudson, Colorado 80642

To the Editor,

Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation has continuously represented that they are our Public Fishery Representative for our Salmon (anadromous) Fisheries. They have further taken on the "apparent" and sole responsibility of enhancing our NW Alaska Salmon Fishery Stocks as they will not allow any other entity to do enhancement. No one can in reality deny that our Small River Salmon Stocks are being caught be the Trawlers in the Lower Bering ea and the Aleutian Chain of Islands. No one can deny that the returning Salmon Stocks in Northwest Alaska are nearing the last ever runs and/or are near extinction.

Yet, those that have taken the responsibility for maintaining our salmon Stocks have not in any form of acceptable responsibility done anything to guarantee that our salmon stocks will survive into the future.

Unfortunately, we the people, the real owners of NSEDC, sit by quietly accepting a mere pittance annually to keep our mouths shut while millions of our one time million dollars are being spent to buy outsider interests in the lower Bering Sea and the Aleutian Chain.

The very few people that have stood up for our NW Alaska Salmon Stocks are being forced out of NSEDC meetings that supposedly are determining the future of our NW Alaska fish stocks. Over $7.2 million have been spent to supposedly enhance our Salmon stocks and what does NSEDC have to show for it? Are we going to wait for something to freeze over before we stand up and are counted? There is no Fish Hatchery operating in NW Alaska as of Today. Let's Give each community few more thousand dollars to keep them quiet while we spend 100's of millions somewhere else and fun NSEDC's exceptionally generous employee take home pay, benefits and NSEDC Board Member travel costs, per diem and financial supplements. See You later, much

Leo B. Rasmussen (former ADF&G employee, former Mayor of Nome, 50-year resident and more than slightly concerned for our fishing future) Nome, AK 99762

Dear Nancy,

Enjoy your paper as always, Don't always agree with you at times, but your paper is a pleasure to read and I look forward to many more issues.

Last weeks paper has another spat between Tim Smith and NSEDC. Having lived in Nome for the past 25 years I have had my issues with a company that is supposed to represent the people of Nome and the surrounding area.

A couple weeks ago NSEDC released their annual report showing that they have a very healthy balance sheet of close to a hundred and fifty million dollars in various enterprises. When was the last time that our City Council asked for and received a proper accounting of their (OUR) finances, in fact where has the CITY shown any interest at all? Rather than holding our hand out we should be proactive and demanding accounta-

As a member community of NSEDC they are supposed to serve us and be accountable to US? It almost seems as though the tail is wagging the dog though!

This incident with Mr. Smith is another example of inexcusable disrespect to a citizen of Nome. I might add that Mr. Smith has almost single handedly been the ONLY voice that Nome has had. Mr. Smith is right! For almost all these years he is the ONLY voice Nome has had during NSEDC local meetings. NSEDC has tried to shut him up over these years, but like that pink rabbit he just won't quit. I went to the web-site Mr. Smith posted of the meeting he was ejected from and threatened with arrest. It was a public meeting in Nome and Mr. Smith had every right to be there and to speak his mind. He cannot and should not be barred from future meetings. As a citizen of Nome he has every right to be present, just as he has every right to attend the City Council meetings. They are supposed to be PUBLIC! They should be OPEN and citizens have every right to question their actions! And get ANSWERS! Not public humiliation and banishment!

Their PUBLIC business is OUR business and must be conducted openly and under the light of day! Anyway that's what I think!

In the spirit of the 1900 Nome Gold Rush, the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum has been pleased to conclude "The 1900 Diary of Wilfred A. McDaniel" which began its run in The Nome Nugget Newspaper back in early June.

June 1900 in the midst of the largest gold rush in Alaska. Wilfred was a gifted photographer, writer, artist, poet and an amateur dentist. During the eight years he lived in Nome he lugged his 20 pound Kodak camera from town to beach claim through rugged creeks and mosquito infested tundra, during powerful Bering Sea storms and furious blizzards. All the while he wrote descriptive letters to his parents in California and maintained a diary covering almost every day he lived on the coast west of Nome.

The result of this determined perseverance is the documentation of the lives of successful beach miners in the Nome gold rush era as well as an insight into the Eskimo people who lived at the Penny, Cripple and Sinuk Rivers at that time. Wilfred died at the age of 80 in 1954, however his thoughts, memories and love drowned it for about half an hour.

"There wasn't much to burn in there, but if it would have caught that floor on fire and the second floor, it would have gone on up and burned the entire superstructure."

Nome people know that would leave Dredge 6 looking like the one that burned by FAA housing north of the Nome Airport-just a metal

Dredge 6 was built from parts of another dredge that collapsed in its pond elsewhere. That dredge and many in the area came off production from Yuba Manufacturing Co. in Yuba City, Calif. Dredge 6 has sat peacefully in its dredge pond among the waterfowl delighting birdwatchers since it shut down in the mid-1990s. Before then, the dredge along with vintage Dredge 5, visible from Dexter Bypass Road, provided income for college students and others willing to plod around in mud driving pipes to thaw ground for the dredges to nibble forward with their bucket lines. In the early 1980s, working in the thaw fields paid $11 and change per hour, about $25 in today's money, plus lots of overtime.

Dredges 5 and 6 started up around 80 years ago, and used coldwater thaw methods refined by mining pioneers Carl and Walter Glavinovich and Wendell P. Hammon to get to coax the gold away from permafrost. The falling price of gold and rising mining costs shut down the dredges in 1963. Rising gold prices would have started their bucket lines clanking again in 1973 had the marine barge Koko Head not sunk on the way from Seattle to Nome bringing dredge repair parts. The dredges cranked up again in the mid-1970s and ran until 1995. The late Pete Tiesler ran Dredge 6 for many years.

Cootus Warnke of Nome remembers working in the thaw fields in

"It was miserably bone-chilling cold, it was dirty, it was hard, but it was good money. When the sun came out it was fun," she said.

There were pipes driven into the icy soil. We had points connected to water that we would drive down into the pipes to thaw the ice so the dredge could move ahead. When we got one of those pipes open, it was thrilling.

Parents of young people working in the thaw fields have memories of sons and daughters coming home with mud riding up and down on their eyelashes.

Johnson feels the fire started from debris piled up and set afire.

"My advice to the gold company is that they secure that dredge better or they aren't going to have a dredge left," Johnson declared.

Nome Gold Alaska currently owns Dredge 6. The company did attempt to secure the dredge a week ago, according to Mitch Erickson, NGA business manager.

'It didn't take long for them to break in again," he said Monday. "It is an attractive nuisance. We are discussing our options today.

Erickson said a backhoe was in the picture to remove the catwalk bridging the pond. Johnson said the department needed a new pump truck to serve their updated equipment.

"The newest pumper we have is 25 years old," he said.

A rule for using the 2012 share is that there must be public participation in deciding how to spend the Community Benefit Share. The $200,000 distribution provides $100,000 for youth activities and $100,000 toward community priorities. The City must submit proof of community involvement, including the minutes of the public meeting by Sept. 28 to loosen the purse strings. The Council will hold a community work session on Sept. 5 at 5:30 p.m. to collect input on priorities for spending the Community Benefit Share. Agencies and people could come to the meeting with ideas on paper and proposed budgets, the Council suggested.

Annie Conger, a teacher in Nome Public Schools bilingual and cultural programs asked for $12,000 to cover materials, food, airfare and other costs of student participation in outof-town cultural activities. The Council asked her to submit a written proposal and budget.

Mitch Erickson proposed spending the entire $200,000 available this year for a year-around multi-use activity center near the Nome Recreation Center to shelter participants and spectators from the weather. The facility could host hockey, broomball, curling, indoor soccer, tennis and be the support site for crosscountry skiing, Summercise youth programs and skating, Erickson suggested.

Put together a budget and a plan, the Council told Erickson.

There is also a proposal afoot to spend the money to support a fish hatchery at Hobson Creek under the aegis of Nome Fishermen's Association headed by Tim E. Smith. This idea was backed by a letter from Chuck Fagerstrom, president of Sitnasuak Native Corp.

In other business, a handout showed that about half the permittees selling pull tabs did not have required reports to the City of Nome up to date. One business owner had not submitted reports

"Even if we had them all in, what would they tell us?" Councilwoman Mary Knodel asked.

'Your guess is as good as mine," Tom Moran, city clerk, responded.

It has been explained by City administrators previously that the City needs to get all the reports together to study the ramifications of proposed sales tax revisions affecting pull tab sales and net benefits to charities and City coffers.

"I'd like to see this on the agenda so we can address it," Knodel said. The City is in the process of updating its sales tax ordinance.

The Council made no comment on an application of Golden China restaurant owner Sunny Kim Song to the state for a new liquor license. The Council has the option to make comment if the panel opposes a liquor license renewal or first appli-

Our crab fishery is now one of the healthiest in the state and a major income generator for resident fishermen, crewmembers, seafood plant workers and bait fishermen. The crab fishery has enhanced the region's overall economy.

NSEDC has been instrumental in building today's fishery with the construction of the Norton Sound Seafood Center in Nome, marketing efforts that deliver better prices for fishermen, and a loan program to get fishermen the gear and vessels they need. NSEDC has expanded the winter commercial crab fishery, giving even more residents a chance to earn income. NSEDC also conducts and funds research to ensure future opportunity for the next generation of fishermen.

VIEW FROM NEWTON PEAK — Nome and the Port of Nome may play an increasingly important role as oil companies head north to develop offshore oil fields in the near future.

timate that the Alaskan Arctic alone could hold more than 300 billion barrels of oil. These numbers need to be confirmed and hence, Statoil is planning its exploration activities to begin no earlier than 2015 during the open water season, Sunde said, provided that Statoil's board gives the directives to go ahead.

If all this happens, this is what Statoil plans: They would be drilling one exploration well at the Amundsen lease, and up to two additional wells in later years. Statoil would use a mobile offshore drill rig, probably a jack-up drill rig, standing on three legs in water depths between 115 to 145 feet. The rig would be supported by a fleet of vessels and oil spill re-

Sunde then handed the microphone to German national Jürgen Weissenberger, a marine biologist employed by Statoil. Weissenberger explained the company's procedure to go forward with exploration plans and the environmental studies that are involved. Weissenberger said that the company is preparing an Environmental Impact Assessment which takes into account the description of the company's plans as well as what techniques they propose to use. "Then we give a description of the environment we're going to operate in, the sea floor, weather conditions, wave heights and so on," Weissenberger said. He reiterated that they are bound by strict federal rules and regulations and that Statoil has its own set of rules for responsible development. "We don't want to harm the environment," Weissenberger said.

Once the analysis is done, he continued, they assess the impacts and if there are impacts, what mitigation efforts need to be taken.

"In talks today, we learned that the hunt for seals is very important to people in this area," Weissenberger said. One of the impacts on seals is noise, he said. In order to find out more about seals' hearing and behavior, Statoil participates in a study financed by a consortium of oil companies. At that point, Weissenberger showed a short video of a captive seal called "Amak", who is trained to push a button when hearing an underwater sound and get a fish as a reward. Weissenberger assured the crowd that the oil companies may be competitive at the gas pump, but when it comes to environmental data, they work together and make sure that studies are shared, and data gathering efforts not un-necessarily duplicated.

Since bowhead whale migration and hunting is of concern, Statoil and other oil companies are financing a $100 million study conducted in Australia, aimed to gather data whether or not noise deflects whales' migration patterns or causes behavioral changes. The study is dubbed BRAHSS, short for "Behavioral Responses of Australian Humpback whales to Seismic Surveys." It is a four-year collaborative study investigating the effects of seismic airguns on the behavior of humpback whales during migration.

During exploration, oil companies use airguns for seismic tests, guns that deploy massive amounts of compressed air into the water, producing a cannonball-like sound. Weissenberger said that current data suggests that the sound they put in the waters in Australia has not caused the majority of whales to react adversely. The study is funded by E&P Sound and Marine Life Joint Industry Programme, JIP for short, and the U.S. Government Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, Regulation and Enforcement. JIP includes companies from the International Association of Oil and Gas Producers including the BG group, BHP Billiton, Chevron, ConocoPhillips, Eni, ExxonMobil, IAGC, Santos, Statoil and Woodside. The International Association of Geophysical Contractors is also a contributor.

Questions asked

Questions from the audience included why the video only included the soothing sound of humpback whales singing and not the actual sound of an airgun. No, we don't have that sound in the video, came the response. And by the way, whale populations are increasing worldwide despite the increasing noise put in the water by human kind, Weissenberger said. "There is a stock of about 120,000 minke whales in the North Sea despite the fact that there is ongoing oil production," said Weissenberger.

Austin Ahmasuk commented that the sound deployed by the Australian experiment is nowhere near the levels of an actual airgun. No, it isn't at this point, said Weissenberger. "We are in the second year of the fouryear study," explained Weissenberger. "With every year, we increase the noise level, so we're getting closer."

Caroline Brown asked to the point: "Who's going to benefit from Statoil's exploration? Alaskans?" Ella Ede, stakeholder engagement manager, answered that exploration doesn't hold many benefits at first. "Exploration is just that," Ede said. "There are some jobs, not a lot, and no revenue. Also, our leases are in federal waters, so even if there is a discovery and production, Alaska sees no revenue sharing." She assured the crowd, that the Alaska delegation in Washington D.C. is working to change that. During exploration, Alaskans may benefit through some training and education opportunities, but that's it.

Jana Varrati wanted to know what Statoil's oil spill record looks like? "In the last ten years there was a significant reduction in oil spills," a Statoil representative said. The last larger accident happened in 2007, when an oil spill happened, brought on by workers who didn't follow proper procedures and used a wrong hose during transfer of the product. In 1979, in the early phases of offshore oil development, Sunde explained, a platform capsized, killing 120 workers. In the aftermath, Sunde said, Norwegian rules and regulations were tightened to make sure that those things don't happen again.

Jim Stimpfle commented that this region keeps seeing crude go south and come back to Nome and the region at exorbitant prices. Why not build refineries here? Sunde explained that refineries are usually built close to the markets. "That's a business decision, where to put a refinery, that's all I can say about it." In short, exploration won't yield economic advantages for the Arctic and production would not mean less pain at the pump in northwest Alaska.

Ken Hughes asked, "If there is a discovery made, how does Statoil get the oil from the well to market?" Lars Sunde said that even if Statoil made a good-sized discovery of oil, it would take more discoveries in the area to make a pipeline project viable. "If there are other discoveries, we assume that somebody will build a pipeline, and if so, we would contribute. To transport crude oil by boats is a very, very difficult task," training to assure the community would receive fluoride treatment, ANTHC provided the equipment but has not found money to install the equipment.

Tim Smith asked the Council during public comment period to sort out the reasons for the Nome Police Dept. to remove him from what he deemed was a public meeting of the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp when he was recording it. According to Smith, the NPD personnel had warned him he would be arrested if he tried to attend future meetings of NSEDC. He would like to be forewarned to avoid a confrontation, Smith said. Council members said there would be follow up to determine the reason for the police response.

Feds issue permit to repair Cape Nome Jetty

By Sandra L. Medearis

A request from the City of Nome to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has yielded a permit to repair Cape Nome jetty storm damage within strict conditions.

Last year's November megastorm's over eight-foot storm surge stole fill from C-docks and committed other damages. The rebuilding of the jetty will cost approximately $1.5 million.

The permit safeguards use of the jetty area waters for public and wildlife. Activity under the permit must not interrupt the public's right to free navigation on all navigable waters of the United States. Should the Corps of Engineers deem that navigation has been compromised, the restoration would need to be removed, relocated or altered at no expense to the federal government.

Required dredging for the project cannot occur in the three weeks between June 24 and July 14 so as not to interfere with juvenile salmon known to "hug the shoreline in the vicinity of the Cape Nome jetty during migration," according to the letter to Joy Baker, harbormaster, from the U.S. Army C.O.E.

The work must be restorative and not supplemental, in that reconstruction must follow previous plans. Otherwise, penalties or legal action could result.

The City must stand the cost of safety lights and signals during the work period.

The Cape Nome Jetty project is part of Port of Nome's basket of upgrades, repairs and expansion plans to serve expanding shipping use of arctic waters.

THE DOCK WALK

By Diana Haecker

Just when Nomeites thought the weather couldn't possibly get worse, another wet weather system moved in last week and put a near-stop to most activities at the Port of Nome due to a six-foot storm surge forecasted for Wednesday, August 22. Harbormaster Joy Baker, in her weekly Dock Walk report, said that several vessels that were scheduled to arrive in Nome reworked their schedule and delayed their arrival in the area last week.

Coming in over the past week were the Alaska Logistics mainline freight barge, three gravel barges loading up dirt and delivering it to Alakanuk and Kipnuk. Only one village freight barge arrived and left, as well as the research boat the Bristol Explorer.

Some fishing boats and most gold dredges stayed put in the harbor when weather hit beginning Tuesday through Sunday. Baker said that the storm surge didn't cause any significant problems. However, the wind kicked up on Friday, and a few lines broke on some vessels, including the stern line on the Capt. Hendren, which needed some fancy rope work to get her tied up again.

On Saturday, weather let up enough to allow the research boat Bristol Explorer to come into the Causeway and tie up. A gravel barge made it in on Sunday to load up gravel and leave. A support boat for the Shell exploration in the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas, Crowley's Pt. Oliktok, was offshore on Sunday, August 26, lightering a crew change and garbage through Bering Marine's Arctic Seal vessel. Shell's drilling rig Kulluk left Dutch Harbor on August 20, bound for Shell's Beaufort Sea lease.

Also on Monday, explosives were lightered to a Northland Services barge offshore that were transported from the defunct Rock Creek gold mine to be shipped out of Nome.

The Coast Guard cutter Alex Haley tied up on the outer cell at the port. A good-sized private yacht was tied up alongside the Russian research boat Professor Khromov and the Canadian icebreaker Polar Prince was anchored offshore. According to the Polar Prince's website, it carries a group of researchers to conduct the first comprehensive study of marine life in the eastern Chukchi Sea. The new study is meant to gather data for scientists and to avoid negative impacts of oil exploration in the region.

As of Monday, there were 84 gold dredges, 30 support vessels and 20 fishing boats registered at the Port of

COME BACK HERE-The Capt. Hendren, a Columbia River tugboat with designs on gold dredging, started to set out for mayhem in the Small Boat Harbor during the storm last week when its stern lines came loose. Garden Tour reveals green side of Nome

A dozen Nomeites showcased their splendors last Sunday during the annual Garden Tour. The curious and the cultured met for a full afternoon of veggies and vetch as they moved through town, over the Dexter Pass Road and down the Beam Road to see what Nome's green thumbs have been up to this summer.

The tour began just a block from Old St. Joe's Hall at the new community garden plot at the corner of Bering and Seppala streets. Inside the Weather Port grows an assortment of flowers along with lettuce, zucchini, green onion, peas, tomatoes and broccoli. Throughout the summer a handful of aspiring green thumbs and volunteers met on Tuesday evenings to cultivate the plants and to build outside beds. The property is sprinkled with innovative growing containers including the basin from a retired washing machine. With vision from Cheryl Thompson and help from builders and donations, the first year shows the promise to, well, grow!

Ave. In her grotto-esque backyard, Olanna has an eclectic mix of trees, perennial flowers, sculpture and fishing nets, which, alongside the old concrete Pioneer mining gold vault, gives the space the feeling of an outdoor gallery. Next the garden enthusiasts wandered through the retreat behind Karen and Greg Mitchell's house. Over the years, the couple has collected "beach art" including seasculpted red bricks, to compliment the assortment of trees, tundra plants and a brilliant shock of nasturtiums.

In another downtown oasis, the Little Sisters of Jesus spent the summer filling a greenhouse with veggies and flowers. Despite the wet August weather, the front garden displays a lovely stand of lupine next to the rhubarb plant just waiting to be cooked into muffins.

As the sun's heat intensified, the garden party traveled to Icy View, where the first stop was Kay and Jim Hansen's house. Alders, poplar and wild perennials border the front lawn. Behind the house, which sits at the southern edge of Icy View, is a landscape fitting to the view. The couple explained the cropped beds of rhubarb and delphiniums. "We would like to show you those, but the musk ox came in and cleared us out,' joked Jim. Still, the greenhouse was hot with peppers and tomatoes.

Across the street, at Angela and Peter Hansen's, the day-trippers entered a true secret garden. Following a trail of river rocks, the group wandered among cottonwoods, sat on the benches surrounded by columbine, trollius, delphinium, poppies, daises and a delicate yet hearty sylene. Angela continues to experiment with new flowers to her garden. "I brought this rose plant over from Fairbanks this year," she said of a pot blooming flowers. "We'll see how it does here next season.'

Down the street, Angie Gorn shared a crazy bunch of juicy raspberries growing in her greenhouse, along with cilantro and other herbs. Alongside her house is a bed of flowering kale and cabbage amidst tundra relics that add character to the neighborhood.

Mercury exposure has harmful effects

By Bob Lawrence, MD

Alaska Family Doctor Alaska Department of Health and Social Services officials are in Nome this week to determine whether Nome miners are being exposed to dangerous levels of mercury. Since ancient times, mercury has been used to refine gold. Roman alchemists in the first century wrote of mercury saying that, "everything except gold floats in it" making it an efficient means separating dirt and other substances from gold.

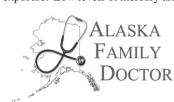

Historically, after mixing mercury with gold to remove impurities, the gold-mercury amalgam would be heated to evaporate the mercury, leaving purified gold. In some parts of the developing world, this ancient method of purifying gold with mercury is still used, but on the Seward Peninsula and along the beaches of Nome the practice was abandoned last century when the harmful health effects of mercury became evident.

Residual mercury, sometimes called "quicksilver," can still be found around historic gold rush sites, like those on the Seward Peninsula and beaches of Nome. The metal remains liquid at room temperature forming a shiny substance that looks like metal but runs like water. Many adults around Nome may remember playing with the slippery heavy liquid metal as children.

But mercury is very poisonous. Odorless vapors are easily absorbed through the lungs and can be partially absorbed through the skin.

Chronic exposure to these vapors causes dysfunction of the nervous system and kidneys. People with mercury poisoning may develop a wide range of problems including tremors, dementia, kidney failure and skin problems. The term "mad hatter" refers to the unusual neurologic and psychiatric problems that affected hat makers in the 1800's who used mercury in the felt-crafting process. Similar health problems are seen today in developing countries where mercury is still used to refine gold and silver.

Elemental mercury used in mining is not the only modern source of exposure. Low levels of mercury are found in cosmetics, dental fillings, some vaccines, and certain forms of seafood. The levels of mercury in most of these items remain well below the levels that cause illness.

Mercury poisoning is difficult to diagnose because the symptoms are similar to other common ailments.

Soon after exposed to mercury fumes a person may feel fatigue, weakness or dizziness. Some people complain of a vague abdominal pain, difficulty breathing, or pain with uri-

After further exposure, a person may develop a skin rash, complain of itchy skin, experience hair loss, or develop cardiovascular problems like high blood pressure or a rapid heart rate.

Chronic exposure causes irritability, anxiety, social withdrawal, tremors and insomnia. People may develop tingling or numbness of the skin and have trouble walking. Others develop visual problems in the form of light intolerance or tunnel vi-

These medical problems are not specific to mercury toxicity. Many things can cause the same constellation of symptoms. Therefore, doctors rely on laboratory testing of the urine and blood to determine a person's risk of exposure.

Treatment for exposure to large amounts of mercury, as might occur in an industrial accident, is available but rarely used for chronic low-level

Prevention of mercury exposure in modern small-scale mining is important because, even with treatment, many health problems associated with exposure cannot be reversed. Spills must be cleaned up using special equipment and potentially contaminated gold must be refined with vents to filter mercury that would otherwise contaminate the air of a community.

Community testing, as performed by the Alaska Department of Health and Social Services this week, will help identify sources of possible mercury exposure and, if necessary, serve as an epidemiological foundation for prevention of future expo-

In fact, many gardeners have reported a higher presence of the critters this year, leaving only stubs in many of the ground level beds. As a deterrent, the students protected seedlings with coffee cans.

On the west side of Newton Peak, Lisa Leeper's green house was the spot closest to the sun. Constructed by her husband Chip the green house and neighboring potato sheds donned a transparent Suntuf siding, which allows for maximum sun and growth. And grow they do. The edible crops surround an aisle of brilliant flowers and guests were treated to a snack of baked kale chips fresh from the oven.

For seasoned participants and newbies alike, the penultimate stop on this year's tour was perhaps the most special. Maybe it was the sun shining over the Kigluaiks, maybe it's the sun room, reminiscent of a floral Victorian reading room, off the back of the camp. Or the looming Siberian larch and the end of the trail. At every turn, Donna Morgan's camp on the Kougarok delighted visitors with its attention to the aesthetic. Tucked alongside the larch and pines sits a greenhouse filled with lush veggies including the sweet carrots the hostess shared with her visitors.

As in the past, this year's garden tour culminated at Cheryl Thompson's gardens at Triple Creek, followed by a potluck. After the potluck, the garden tour crowd piled into the bus one more time to check out Rick Wolf's cabbage, beet and broccoli crop in his high tunnel green house. Part of Wolf's secret to huge cabbages is the mixture of horse manure and tundra soil, raised in three rows inside the high tunnel. Wolf owns two Icelandic ponies who generously supply the manure.

Thompson organizes the tour each year and is an enthusiastic gardener, Master gardener and generous teacher.

Thompson has cultivated an array of wild and domestic plants at her home, and her love for gardening can be seen in pockets all over town, including the dredge buckets along Front Street and Anvil City Square.

High water knocks out Norton Sound counting projects

Following are excerpts from a regional fisheries update for the fourth week in August by Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game.

High water has knocked out most of the salmon escapement counting projects in Norton Sound. All escapement counts should be considered minimum counts. For the second week in a row, poor weather conditions kept Norton Sound fishermen on the beach last week. The commercial salmon harvest to date by 119 permit holders is 62,000 chums, 203,000 pinks, 95 sockeyes and 29,000 silvers.

In the Kotzebue district, the commercial catch totals 222,000 chum salmon by 79 permit holders. Catches and fishing efforts last week were well below average because weather kept most fishermen on the beach or close to the beach. If the weather improves, the pre-season forecast for a chum salmon harvest of 250,000 to 280,000 fish could be reached this week.

Escapement project reports

 Unalakleet River test fish-Catches through Aug. 24 were 26 kings, 1,404 chums, 573 pinks, 1 sockeye and 205 silvers. The test net was knocked out for two days when high water brought trees and other debris down the river. This is the first time the net did not fish due to high water since 1994. The silver catch ranks 11th out of 28 years. The average third quarter point at the test net for silvers is Aug. 28.

• North River tower-Cumulative counts through Aug. 17 were 996 kings, 9,035 chums, 147,664 pinks and 3,036 silvers. The tower has been knocked out by high water since Aug. 18. The average third quarter point for silver passage at the tower is Aug. 25.

 Unalakleet River floating weir– The project ended for this year after counting through Aug. 15. Cumulative counts were 776 kings, 73,776 chums, 687,044 pinks, 241 sockeyes and 15,394 silvers.

• Shaktoolik sonar- Cumulative passage through Aug. 23 is estimated to be 490,000 salmon with an apportionment of 1,000 kings, 44,000 chums, 434,000 pinks and 11,000 sil-

• Inglutalik River tower in the Norton Bay subdistrict- Cumulative counts through Aug. 21 were 1,146 kings, 32,083 chums, 87,021 pinks and 1,362 silvers. Counting conditions at the tower have been very poor for more than a week.

• Kwiniuk River tower in the Elim subdistrict- Cumulative counts through Aug. 16 were 36 kings, 5,499 chums, 381,585 pinks and 770 silvers. The project has been pulled. The river overflowed its banks at the campsite on Aug. 20, the average midpoint date for silver passage at · Niukluk River tower in the Golovin subdistrict- Cumulative counts through Aug. 16 were 21 kings, 19,672 chums, 249,326 pinks and 1,708 silvers. The project was knocked out in the early morning hours of Aug. 17. The average midpoint past the tower for silvers is Aug. 21. The project will be pulled.

• Nome River weir in the Nome subdistrict- Cumulative counts through Aug. 15 were 6 kings, 1,982 chums, 148,813 pinks, 41 sockeyes and 224 silvers. The weir was knocked out by high water on Aug. 16. The average midpoint past the weir for silvers is Aug. 28. If water levels allow, the department plans to reinstall the weir late this week. • Snake River weir in the Nome subdistrict- Cumulative counts through Aug. 15 were 651 chums, 6,119 pinks, 1 sockeye and 14 silvers. High water knocked out the weir on Aug. 15. The average midpoint past the weir for silvers is Aug.

• Pilgrim River weir in the Port Clarence district- Cumulative counts through Aug. 19 were 61 kings, 25,529 chums, 46,135 pinks and 7,117 sockeyes. The weir was knocked out Aug. 19. An aerial survey count of 5,825 sockeye salmon in Salmon Lake and the Grand Central River occurred on Aug. 20.

Crab season still open

More than 17,000 pounds of crab remain in the Community Development Quota portion of the Norton Sound commercial red king crab fishery. The ADF&G will extend the season past the Sept. 3 closure date if requested to do so by Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., which holds the CDQ allocation in the fishery.

The open access portion of Norton Sound's commercial crab fishery closed on Aug. 11. The harvest of 441,080 pounds by 29 permit holders was more than 10,000 pounds above the guideline harvest level of 430,540 pounds. Combined with the CDO harvest, the total harvest stands at 458,129 pounds.

Arctic sea ice is at historic low

By Diana Haecker

The National Snow and Ice Data Center reported on Monday that the Arctic sea ice has broken the 2007 record for minimum ice coverage and is now the lowest since satellites are used to track sea ice. With a few more weeks left in the melt season, sea ice continues to fall below 2007 daily extents. Arctic sea ice extent fell to 1.58 million square miles on August 26. According to NSIDC, this was 27,000 square miles below the September 18, 2007 daily extent of 1.61 million square miles. The sea ice melted at near-2007 levels through July, but then started to rapidly decline faster in early August.

The super fast melt has slowed down some, but still sea ice melts about 29,000 square miles per day, an equivalent to the size of the state of South Carolina. A "normal" rate of melting around this time of the year is about 15,000 square miles, says the NSIDC. The six lowest ice extents in the satellite record have occurred in the last six years from 2007

The low ice cover caps a summer of record-breaking extreme weather events. Since January, more than 40,000 high temperature records have been broken in the United States, according to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. At the end of July, the hottest month on record in the lower 48, approximately two-thirds of the country was in drought.

Earlier this month, researchers with the European Space Agency's CryoSat-2 probe reported that Arctic sea-ice volume is declining much faster than expected, with 3,118 cubic miles of sea ice measured in the summer of 2004 and only 1,679 cubic miles this summer. Experts estimate that at the current pace, the Arctic could be ice-free in the summer for a day or more by the end of the decade.

AND THEY'RE OFF— Competitors in the Girls Varsity race leave the starting line of the 5 km cross country race. Rosa Schmidt, bib# 3, won the race with Senora Ahmasuk, bib# 1, finishing second. Summer Ulroan from Chevak came in third place.

Nome excels in home Cross Country meet

By Stephen Palmatier

Last Saturday, on what was a beautiful day at the Nome-Beltz Junior-Senior High School, the Nome cross country runners were sent off from the starting line in their races with a command of ready, set and go. The command was not only a start to their race, but rather a symbol of the home sports season of Nome kicking off.

Teams from Unalakleet, Chevak and Kotzebue raced halfway up Anvil Mountain and back down to the finish line behind the school where the race started. The race was only five km, or just over three miles, but the mountain and course of the race made it as demanding as any cross-country race of that distance.

Kicking off the meet was the mixed junior high and junior varsity race. With 21 boys and girls participating in this race, and 18 coming from Nome, the Nome Nanooks were able to take the first seven spots in the race. Finishing in first place for Nome was Bobby Pate, a high school freshman, in a time of 22 minutes and 37 seconds, defeating second place finisher James Jorgenson of Nome by one minute and 16 seconds. Pate ran the race for the first time and loved everything about it. "It was great. I love the hill. I don't find it too hard," said Pate.

Nolan Horner finished third with a time of 24 minutes and 5 seconds.

The top three girl finishers in the race were Carmella McCall of Kotzebue in 11th place,, Kerry Ahmasuk of Nome finished 13th and Bianca Trowbridge of Nome in 14th place.

Eighteen girls then competed in the girls' varsity run. Nome took the top two spots in dominating fashion. Finishing in first was junior Rosa Schmidt with a time of 22 minutes and 49 seconds. Schmidt said she was nervous about the race but was certainly looking forward to it. "I didn't sleep very well the night before, but I'm used to the course, and I really like running it," said Schmidt.

Following Schmidt in second place was Senora Ahmasuk with a time of 24 minutes and 20 seconds. In third place, more than four minutes behind Ahmasuk was Summer Ulroan of Chevak with a time of 28 minutes and 29 seconds.

Nome defeated Kotzebue by scoring five less total points to win the large school race team score. The scoring is based on the top five finishers for each school and adding up their places in the race. Chevak and Unalakleet had only three girl runners each, which qualified them in the small school score where Nome also won.

Twenty-four runners competed in the boy's varsity race. With all four teams having at least five runners in this race, it was a very competitive race for the team score. The Nanooks were able to top Kotzebue winning by a difference of four points. Tim Schmidt contributed to the Nanooks' victory as first place finisher. He put in a time of 19 minutes and 36 seconds, the only person to beat the 20-minute barrier all day. Schmidt credits his coaches who have taught him for that mark. "I have really learned how to do a good form while running. I've had good coaches over the years," said Schmidt.

Finishing in second place was Elijah Matchian of Chevak with a time of 20 minutes and 18 seconds and in third place was Gary Eakin of Kotzebue with a time 20 minutes and 38 seconds. The Nanooks also had three other runners make the top ten. Leif Erickson finished in 6th place, James Horner finished in 9th, and Degnan Lawrence finished in 10th.

The final race of the invitational was not one of competition, but rather of fun as 26 cross-country runners and community members of Nome participated. Finishing in first place was Nils Hahn with a time of 20 minutes and 36 seconds. Hahn, who previously finished second in the Anvil Mountain race last month said that this 5K run was one that has everything to it. "It's a great course. It's very scenic and quite challenging with lots of turns and a long downhill," said Hahn.

Finishing in second place was Tyler Rhodes just 15 seconds behind Hahn, and in third place was Nick Hanson with a time of 21 minutes and 10 seconds.

Jeff Collins, one of two coaches this year along with Tara Schmidt, says that he thinks the potential is very strong with this squad.

"Our girls team should be a top three team this year in the state, and I expect our girls team to compete by next year for a state championship," said Collins. "And our boys team should be a top 5 team this year in the state as well."

The Nanooks runners now move on to the rest of their season, heading to Kotzebue next in two weeks.

FAST VISITOR— Elijah Matchian from the Yukon-Kuskokwim Delta village of Chevak finished in second place in the fastest heat of the day, the Boys Varsity 5k race, in a time of 20 minutes, 18 seconds.

Nome Volleyball team starts strong in season opener

By Stephen Palmatier

Last weekend, the Nome Lady Nanooks kicked off their 2012 season with two victories, defeating the Kotzebue Huskies both on Friday and Saturday in Kotzebue. The ladies, having some possible questions entering this season with a new coach and loss of some senior starters, seemed to not miss a beat as they left right off from last season's success.

In the first match, whatever anxiety and nerves the ladies of Nome had starting a new season went away fast as they dominated Kotzebue, winning in straight sets, 25-6, 25-7 and 25-11. The Lady Nanooks took control from the opening point and never let up the whole match.

Much of the same was true for the second match the next day. Once again, the ladies won in straight sets, but it was not quite as easy for them as they won 25-12, 25-23 and then 25-11. In that second set, the Huskies pushed the Nanooks to the brink, but Nome was able to outlast them.

"This weekend went well," said Lucas Frost, first year head coach for the Lady Nanooks. "As a whole team, we kept communicating well with each other, and they were able to help each other in tough spots. Our passing from the back court was good and we were able to get a majority of the sets up to our hitters," said Frost.

Those hitters included Taylor Pomeranz who led the team with 16 kills, Devynn Johnson who had 9 kills and Ariana Horner who added 7. The passing was just as crisp as Dylan Johnson led with 24 assists and Kathy Holly had 14. Coach

Frost also says the serving was terrific as well.

"Our serving really helped us maintain a large lead over Kotzebue. Over the 6 sets, we had 35 service aces and under 10 service errors which is really good for a first match," said Frost.

For Coach Frost, this first match was not just important to get his Nome ladies off to a good start, but also he had extra motivation going back to Kotzebue where last year he coached.

"I coached in Kotzebue last year so heading back as an opponent was a little different. I was able to hear plenty of traitor comments being thrown around, so I just wanted to win so we wouldn't be embarrassed. After the announcements, all I could say to the team was that we need to destroy them, and the girls showed up with intensity and did that," said Frost.

After one weekend, it is always hard to pinpoint where a team is in comparison with the rest of their competition. The Lady Nanooks are certainly a talented bunch, but with a new head coach always means change of strategies, work put in practices, and how that coach can connect with his or her players. But Frost believes that his team has the potential to be strong once again.

"This team has so much potential and we are starting off on a good foot. The girls have an eagerness to do really well. There are some things that need to be fixed prior to our next match, but all in all the girls are pleased with the performance in Kotzebue. I definitely can see that there is work still to be done to improve our skills to the next level, but if we can reach that next level, we just might be a dominant force in the region," said Frost.

The Lady Nanooks next play on September 7 and 8 once again against Kotzebue for their home opener at the Den of the Mighty Nanooks where they will look to have more success against the

Saying It Sincerely

Member of the Nome Ministerial Association

"What is faith? It is the confident assurance that something we want is going to happen. It is the certainty that what we hope for is waiting for us, even though we cannot see it ahead."—Hebrews 11:1 TLB -

Because faith is an invisible reality, we sometimes think of it as a mystical thing without realizing how practical it really is. Actually, faith is personal trust!

The Bible says, "While God was testing him, Abraham still trusted God and his promises, and so he offered his son Isaac, and was ready to slay him on the altar of sacrifice, yes, to slay even Isaac through whom God had promised to give Abraham a whole nation of descendants! He believed that if Isaac died God would bring him back to life again."

- Hebrews 11:17-19 TLB Abraham had a very personal trust in God - even to the point of raising his son from the dead. This is faith! Faith is confidence!

The Bible says, "By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." —Hebrews 11:24-25 TLB

Moses had more confidence in God than he did in Pharaoh. This is a wonderful example of Faith in action!

Faith is firm reliance!

Can you say that God is reliable? Look at the prostitute Rahab. She believed that God was reliable. She cast herself on God's mercy by hiding the Hebrew spies that came to Jericho. She was saved because she trusted in the reliability of God.

We need to apply this to our own situations. We need to have enough personal trust, confidence and reliance on God to meet our needs, regardless of how impossible or difficult they may seem to be. We must learn to trust God for the miracle we need!

We must begin to live according to our faith! We must begin to praise and worship him with everything that is within us. We must open our eyes and see his marvelous grace and love for us. We must learn to depend on his word and allow it to become a "lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path." We must have faith! We must believe!

In loving memory of our dad, community leader, King Island drummer, singer & dancer Gabriel L. Muktoyuk Sr. September 3 1938 - February 5 2006. We miss you dearly! Much love from your family.

AGREEMENT STRENGTHENS TIES BETWEEN US AND RUSSIA

The people of Nome and the surrounding villages are at the forefront of a major international initiative linking nations across the Bering Strait. The National Park Service and the residents of the Bering Straits region will soon be working even more closely with their counterparts in Russia. Cooperation in the shared region of Beringia in both Alaska and Chukotka, Russia is a major priority at the highest levels of government. In mid-September, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Russia's Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov will likely sign an agreement concerning the establishment of a transboundary protected area in Beringia. The formalization of the relationship between the National Park Service and Russia's Ministry of Natural Resources acknowledges the mutual interests of both countries in the ongoing conservation, protection, and management of protected areas in the Beringia region. The purpose of this agreement would be to strengthen the relationships and maintain the ties between indigenous people, scientists, educators, students, elders, and youth.

While the signing of this agreement may not directly affect or change anything for many of the residents of the region, it will create opportunities for everyone. Because it is at the highest levels of government, the attention will shine a spotlight on the region and the resulting economic benefits will be felt by all. It is anticipated that the improved infrastructure in both Alaska and Russia will foster eco-tourism and adventure travel. Of special importance to the residents of Nome and the surrounding villages, the agreement recognizes the importance of family ties, language, and the protection of shared cultural traditions.

The two countries, through their respective agencies, further agree to support the protection and maintenance of sustainable subsistence hunting. The agreement is a significant step towards the official designation of the "Trans boundary Area of Shared Beringian Heritage," which will eventually include existing Alaska parklands. Since 1991, the creation of a transboundary area has been sought through the National Park Service's funding of partnerships between Russians and Americans. To this end, the United States plans to contribute the Bering Land Bridge National Preserve and Cape Krusenstern National Monument, totaling 3.2 million acres. New lands will not be obligated on the Alaska side and regulations regarding subsistence, access to resources, and land use will not change. The corresponding lands on the Russian side total 4.2 million acres, and are spread throughout the region. While the agreement will not officially create this transboundary area, it is a meaningful effort towards this goal. The signing of an agreement at such a high level will distinguish the existing partnerships and collaborative projects. The Beringia region will stand as a dramatic example of cooperation between nations who share natural and cultural resources.

Anchorage, Valley voters kill Measure 2 in primary elections

By Diana Haecker

According to unofficial results from the Alaska Division of Elections, the majority of Alaskan voters, mostly hailing from urban areas and the interior, voted No on Ballot Measure 2, which would have reinstated a new Alaska Coastal Management Program in last week's 2012 primary election.

It was not a close call, either, with 38 percent - or roughly 40,000 - ofthe votes cast for and nearly 62 percent against the measure.

After all 438 Alaskan precincts reported and all 107,223 ballots were counted, it became clear that the large advertising campaign financed by multinational oil, gas and mining industries was successful to sway public opinion against the resurrection of a coastal management program that would have given the state and local governments a say in the development of coastal assets

Senator Donny Olson (D- District T) said in an interview with The Nome Nugget that the money raised by the "Vote No on 2" campaign was an insurmountable obstacle that allowed the group to outspend the Alaska Sea Party, the ballot measure's proponents, seven to one on advertising campaigns. Olson said he was gravely disappointed by the industry to have stifled Measure 2 with ads that misrepresented the intent of the ballot measure. "We need to see if something can be done legislatively," Olson said.

District 39 House Representative Neal Foster said he was sad about the measure's failure. "It means less opportunity of input by coastal communities when it comes to having a say in what happens in their back yard," Foster said. Alaska now is the only state in the union without a federally-funded coastal management program in place. "There is a good possibility that legislature will be put forward to restore the program," Foster said. But he also added that there is talk that it might be too soon after the ballot's defeat to bring it back into the political arena.

The fate of a new coastal management program depends on the bigger picture that will emerge after the November general elections. Foster said if the Senate bipartisan coalition is broken up after the November elections and reorganized, there would be a big chance that a newly introduced bill to recreate the coastal management program would not be as strong as what was proposed in the language of the ballot measure. Also, if Mitt Romney is to

Musk ox attack claims another dog's life

By Sandra L. Medearis

Mitch Erickson had to take a friend's dog to the veterinarian to be put down Friday evening. Erickson found the dog injured by musk ox at a dog lot he has shared with local musher Diana Adams for about 15

"I had to have it put down. It took a lung shot," Erickson said.

Adams dog was an old friend. "My only comment is that a 13year-old dog should not die this way," Adams said Monday.

The dog was tethered in what is called the "compound," an area shared by dog team owners to the north of Alaska Commercial Co where the road runs between Nome-Teller Highway and Center Creek Road, according to Erickson. The lot is under Nome Kennel Club jurisdiction and has many sled dogs tied out by shelters

In chalking up another attack on dogs by musk ox coming to town in increasing numbers, Erickson said he believed that abundant willows by the dog lots attracted the three herds of musk ox browsing there.

'They love those willow leaves. I can show you branches that are to-

Air Force has no funds to demolish White Alice— for now

By Sandra L. Medearis

The White Alice towers may continue to poke the sky from Anvil Mountain—at least for a while. The towers are antennas left over from an early warning system erected by the military in the 1950s.

Sitnasuak Native Corp. ordered the towers demolished following an Aug. 14 meeting of its land committee, a reversal of an earlier request to the U.S. Air Force to leave them

On the Web:

After spending money over a three-year period to remove toxic PCBs from soil at the site and replace hazardous components to make a safe historical site, the U.S. Air Force says it has no money earmarked to demolish and remove the four 60-foot repeaters, the last standing remnants from the Alaska sys-

SNC gave the Air Force the goahead to strip the asbestos from the White Alice towers and decontaminate surrounding soil in 2011 on the route to a three-way agreement among City of Nome, SNC and the Air Force to transfer the towers to community use. The back panels of the towers were contaminated by Glassbestos, a type of insulation combining glass and asbestos, according to an analysis conducted by USAF. That has been removed and replaced with non-toxic panels.

SNC is in line to claim the land under a government program, and has been in ongoing negotiations with the City of Nome to lease the tower site, according to reports at Nome Common Council from Josie Bahnke, city manager. Before that could happen, the federal Bureau of Land Management had to declare the site safe of toxic waste and accept it for conveyance to SNC. BLM is the clearinghouse for Alaska Native land

The Air Force has been on a campaign to clean up former military sites. They maintain they spent extra money and effort to preserve the White Alice site.

In a statement Aug. 30 from Tommie Baker, the Air Force said that because SNC asked for the towers to remain, no funds had been set aside for demolition. Caught by surprise, the Air Force would start looking for money, but it could take years to find the funds and execute the project to remove the antennas.

This change in direction is unfortunate, as considerable taxpayer resources have been expended to leave the antenna structures in tact, that would not have been required had the towers been demolished initially instead of abated," Lt. Col. Elwood Henry, commander of 611th Civil Engineer Squadron said. "We are looking into the options for the best way to proceed from this point."

John Handeland is chair of the Nome Museum and Library Commission, as well as leader of the informal group, Friends of White Alice. When demolition of the towers came up in the late 1990s, and again in 2010, there were protests from the public that uses the towers as landmarks for summer and winter travel. A plan was worked out for the City of Nome to take over the site.

However, a new development several years ago made the site available for claiming by SNC under the Alaska Land Transfer Acceleration Act. There were further protests from those who loved the towers for historical value and as navigation aids. The City of Nome began negotiations to lease the 11-acre site from Sitnasuak.

"There were many of these White Alice sites around Alaska, but our four towers are all that remain. They are an important era in our history, not just of our community, but of our world," Handeland said last week.

Handeland said he hoped that a way could be found still to save the towers and satisfy the concerns of all interested groups involved.

Chuck Fagerstrom, Sitnasuak's president, told Radio KNOM that the current board of directors had not wanted to keep the towers because of potential risk of personal injury, lawsuits and financial obligation of upkeep in the future. That risk and the cost of maintenance to shareholders has been an ongoing concern for

To the Editor,

NSEDC will continue to invite the public to our meetings

It is no surprise that Tim Smith paints an ugly picture of NSEDC through his recent letters to the editor and remarks to reporters. It is something he has done for decades with total ignorance, willful or otherwise, to the truth.

But Smith's claims against NSEDC over the years have never let the truth or full story get in the way. Just because his misleading statements go un-checked doesn't make them fact or truth.

We agree that Smith's interactions with NSEDC are rarely productive or positive. However, the fault for this falls squarely on Smith's shoulders. Once again this is the case in regard to his latest tirades against NSEDC over his removal from a recent committee meeting.

Although we are not required to do so, NSEDC's Board of Directors has a longheld tradition of inviting the public to our meetings which are conducted in a format very similar to a city council meeting. These meetings are announced in advance, and the board allows the public and local media to attend and offer com-

NSEDC is not like a city council, however, when it comes to the state's open meetings law and its requirements. This status has been affirmed in court rulings. As far as meeting requirements go, a more accurate comparison would be to entities like Alaska Native corporations, regional health care organizations or other regional nonprofit entities.

As a private, nonprofit corporation,

NSEDC has elected to keep its meetings open all these years without being required to do so. Despite one individual's disruptive behavior and refusal to follow simple ground rules at a meeting, NSEDC will continue to invite the public to attend our quarterly board and committee meetings. NSEDC, however, is well within its right to remove from its meetings people who become disruptive, abusive, or have trouble adhering to normal meeting protocol. The simple fact that NSEDC is a private nonprofit corporation makes all of Smith's perceived outrages over his removal irrelevant, no matter what laws or statutes he tries to incorrectly apply to the situation.

NSEDC's interactions with Tim Smith are no indication of a broader policy toward the public. Smith has a history of threatening and initiating lawsuits against NSEDC and is currently involved in active litigation against NSEDC. This is in the form of an appeal after a judge ruled against him on all points in his most re-cent lawsuit. This and unscrupulous be-havior—such as attempting to take ownership NSEDC's long-held seafood business name through improper online filings—prompts NSEDC to closely monitor its interaction and communications with Smith.

Smith's actions toward NSEDC staff and board members have gone beyond mere criticism to the point of harassment in both written and verbal communication. The time has come to say enough is enough. NSEDC's decisions have been in the interest of providing a safe and productive environment for both its staff and board members.

Smith likes to say he speaks for the public, but Smith really just speaks for Smith. The public and local media remain welcome at NSEDC's meetings. This includes Smith's wife, Rita Smith. Contrary to their claims, NSEDC never asked Rita Smith to leave the meeting from which her husband was removed. She left the meeting chambers on her own accord and any claim that NSEDC expelled her is Another falsehood being lobbed at NSEDC is that it prevents others from conducting fishery-related projects. NSEDC is one of the only entities taking an active role in regional fisheries outside of the Alaska Department of Fish and Game (ADF&G). The fact that NSEDC is one of the few groups stepping forward in the region to tackle this important work in no way means it is blocking others from doing so.

NSEDC has worked with and provided funding to several regionally based entities on fishery projects over the years, including Kawerak, Nome Public Schools, ADF&G, and the Native villages of Unalakleet, White Mountain, and Elim. While Smith falsely claims NSEDC stands in the way of his projects, the truth is NSEDC has historically been the largest supporter of Smith and his Nome Fishermen's Association. From 2005-2008, NSEDC designated more than $350,000 in funding toward his Hobson Creek fisheries project.

NSEDC supported Smith's efforts up to the point he chose to stop seeking ADF&G permits to proceed. NSEDC's Board of Directors made the obvious decision to stop funding a small incubation fisheries project whose operator could not or would not obtain the necessary permits, but was still proposing a salary and benefits well over $200,000 a year.

Despite this track record, Smith and his association are free to pursue projects on their own or with organizations other than NSEDC. Whether or not he can receive permits to conduct his projects is a decision to be made by ADF&G, not NSEDC.

NSEDC is proud of its efforts to restore coho and chum runs in the Nome, Solomon and Snake river systems, as well as initial work on Chinook enhancement in eastern Norton Sound. On its own NSEDC also has revitalized the Salmon Lake fertilization project to stabilize sockeve runs after it was abandoned a few years ago. These projects, in addition to the many research and counting projects run by NSEDC, deliver significant benefits to the region and would be sorely missed if stopped.

There is plenty of work to be done in the interest of fishery management and

Get Involved

How much is too much time and effort to make Nome a better town? How much is too much time to sacrifice from our daily routine to steer Nome to a bright future? Nome has a lot of good people with exceptional talent and ability. We have people who love our town. We need candidates who do not have their own private ax to grind or special interest to feed.

So, we need good people to run for public office. We need them on City Council, School Board and Utility Board. It is grass roots government that makes America what it is. It is these candidates who reflect the true nature of democracy and the power of local government. It is the little guys who make things better and who are needed in local government.

Now is not the time to sit back and complain. Now is the time to take action and get involved. It is also time to encourage folks who would be good candidates, but need some reassurance to run for office. Our city and our schools need good dedicated public officials. Get involved. Run for office. - N.L.M.-

September 11 and a family's journey

By Deven Parlikar

September 11, 2001 started out like any other morning, chaotic and disorganized, with our two young daughters screaming for attention as my wife and I got ready for work. That's when the phone rang, a call that would change our lives forever. It was Sept 11, 2001 and the call was from my parents in India telling us that a plane had hit one of the twin towers of the World Trade Center. An accident, I suppose, perhaps a light plane hitting one of the towers, nothing to worry about. The twin towers were built to withstand that, I assured myself. I turned the TV on, more to watch the sensation and excitement rather than watch history unfold before my own eyes. As I watched in horror. I saw a second plane, one that looked like a commercial airliner hit the second tower. Agony, dismay, fear, helplessness and every other extreme emotion was caught within me. Everything I ever knew about America would change that day. We would live in a different America, a changed emotional and political landscape, a land scarred by this blatant attack. In days to come, we would become strangers in our adopted homeland, sometimes hated by our own fellow citizens. In our faces, they saw the faces of the monsters that destroyed their most beloved landmark of capitalism and free market; the spirit of American freedom; the very essence of Americana. And it was during those days that followed 9/11 that I started my unapologetic and profound love affair with America; its people and all it stands

Yes, I remember the grocery store clerk who asked me to go back to where I came from if I hated this country so much; yes, I remember the dirty looks from fellow passengers on a flight to Washington DC; yes, I remember an armed forces veteran on that flight who told me that his love for America could not allow him talk to me, when I said hello to him while boarding the flight. Yes, despite that, I fell in love with America. Because for every aspersion cast at me, there were many more experiences where people showed genuine love; the folks standing in line behind me at the grocery store who expressed shock at the words of the clerk, the flight attendants on Delta Airlines who apologized to me for how I was being treated by some of my fellow passengers and the kind gentlemen who questioned the patriotism of the veteran who so openly displayed hate towards someone he did not know. Yes, I told myself, I had picked a great country to call my new home. It was indeed the land of the free and the home of the brave!

Our personal journey with 9/11 began on September 11, 2003 at 1:07 AM. My wife, pregnant with our third child, and I, watched our second daughter, Meera, fast asleep in her hospital bed on the med/surg floor of Rady Children's Hospital in San Diego. The night before, we were told by emergency room physicians that she had a golf ball sized malignant brain tumor; that a major surgery was imminent and they could not tell us whether she would make it alive. Ironically, that day, my wife had started the third trimester of her pregnancy with our son.

Our daughter, Meera, was born on April 7, 2001 and when she emerged into this world, she took my breath away. The nurse was holding a baby in her hand that could only be described as perfect in every way, but most importantly, a girl instead of a boy that we were expecting. A gorgeous girl who would continue to surprise us throughout her life! When I held her for the first time. I felt like I was touched by an angel. We made plans for her - she would grow up to be crowned Ms. USA, become an attorney, fight for all things good and noble in this world, but most of all she would grow up to be a beautiful young lady, one who would make us so proud. In that short fleeting moment, I even dreaded the day I would have to give her away in marriage to someone who I know I would not like because he was stealing her away from me! She would be loved and revered and blessed and held and loved some more. Nothing would ever happen to her. At that moment in time, she was invincible; we were invincible and supremely blessed and fortunate.

Less than three years later, I sat in a desolate hospital room dreading whether I would have to carry her in a casket to her final resting place instead of giving her away in marriage. We looked helplessly at our daughter, hooked to an IV drip, dreading the moment when the surgeon would walk in and tell us what we were not prepared to hear. On one hand we were looking forward to the arrival of our son, vet on the other we were planning the possible demise of our daughter. Our sorrow and despair cannot even be captured in words. We had spent the previous night recapping our life with her; from the time my wife gift wrapped the positive pregnancy test and left it on my office desk for me as a present; the joy her birth brought to us, the blessings she bestowed upon us, her angelic face and her zest for life, even for someone so young. We thanked God for letting us have her for two years. We made peace with God to let Him take His child back, hoping only that we had not let Him down: that we had taken care of her like He wanted us to! Little did we realize then that our life with her had just begun!

Yes, on September 11, 2003, Meera was reborn. The angel who came into our life on April 7, 2001 left us that day. leaving behind a parting gift of hope, survival and a very special child. After the longest six hours of our life, Meera emerged from the operating room and was wheeled into ICU. Her neurosurgeons told us that she did really well during the procedure and they got the tumor out. They warned us that the journey of a lifetime was just about to begin. We realized that for Meera to survive, we had to believe that she would, that we had to instill the strength in her to fight all odds, that we had to believe that she would survive this journey before she could, that we had to make peace with the part of us that died that day, and the part that was born. And so began our journey of hope, love, support and reconciliation. From the ashes of despair rose the phoenix of hope

The time following 9/11/2001 also signifies the phoenix that rose from the ashes of the twin towers, part of the pentagon and the field near Johnstown, PA and made Americans appreciate what they had and how vulnerable life could be. As Americans, for that matter as a civilization, we were horrified, angry, helpless, dismayed and embittered. However, even through that time, we found resolve, dignity, hope, support, resilience and compassion. We felt a mix of emotions we never felt we could experience. Anger in one instance, followed by compassion and a true appreciation for the human spirit in another! Like America, our Meera would never be the same again, she would be scarred for life; like America, our Meera was holding on to dear life in the days after her surgery, not knowing what was fated for her; like America, our Meera slowly hobbled back to life; like America, our Meera showed the spirit and tenacity to survive and like America, our Meera emerged stronger than she ever was before. And America and Meera together taught our family the importance of compassion, of being thankful, of not taking anything for granted and of the spontaneity of life.

So, 9/11 is a bittersweet day for us! We remember 9/11/2001 with a great deal of sadness and pain and we remember 9/11/2003 with a great deal of joy and hope. The former saddens the Americans in us; the latter gladdens the family that was allowed to be. And yet, we have shared emotions for both days. We have become more hopeful, more forgiving, more pragmatic, more tolerant and more vigilant. We have learned to love indiscriminately. We have vowed to never take things for granted. We appreciate every day for the joys it brings us. We go to bed every night, thankful for the day we had, and wake up every morning, hopeful for the day ahead of us. We kiss our children every morning and wish them a happy birthday! Life, in all its complexities has become simpler in many ways; people, in general, seem kinder, more hopeful. We are raising our children to understand the meaning of freedom, of being privileged Americans, of advanced citizenry, to be born in a family and a country that appreciates them for who they are, not what society expects of them. But in the ultimate analysis, 9/11 has taught us the importance of unconditional love, whether it is for your country or your family, for it is only that love that will stand the test of time and allow us to overcome all our setbacks and obstacles!

God bless America and God bless all who call it home!

local citizens' radio group, SPARC, use the tower site in their communication network

Before White Alice came to stand on Anvil Mountain, a resident of Nome wanting to make a long distance call had to make a reservation to use one of two circuits out of town. White Alice boosted that number to a whopping 15 circuits and expanded the opportunity for chitchat.

People from Nome and Lower 48 who treasure relics of history want to see White Alice survive.

'Tearing down monuments is not a good idea," Laura Samuelson, Carrie M McLain Museum director, said. "We should appreciate and remember the efforts of those who built this town and this state.'

The White Alice system of 33 stations at intervals of up to 200 miles covered 3,100 miles of routes during the Cold War. The telecommunications system was a part of Alaska's defense industry valued at $300 million annually in the late 1950s and early 1960s, according to documents published by telecommunications in-

The White Alice network, conceived by Bell Telephone Laboratories engineers in 1954, answered the need for a modern communications system to serve civilian and military needs to get messages through static and all weather conditions.

The military relied on White Alice connections as an early warning system in event of Soviet attack. BTL engineers recommended a new technology that used a "feed horn" in front of the antenna to spray a radio signal containing many telephone conversations and telegraph messages against the curved surface of the antenna which then beamed it toward the horizon.

A very small fraction of the signal would survive and then bounce down off a layer of atmosphere surrounding the earth called the troposphere. An antenna at the next White Alice station would pick up the signal, amplify it, and bounce it on its way to the person waiting at the end of the circuit.

The two pairs of antennas stood in opposite directions to catch and forward messages coming and going. The stations used a large amount of electrical power to get their messages across. White Alice station on Anvil Mountain, designated AVM on system maps, generated all its own power, according to Stan Harhut of Anchorage, boss of the station for most of his 22 years on the mountain. Some of the antennas looked like Nome's, like huge drive-in movie screens, standing 60 feet high and weighing up to 100 tons. Nowadays Nome's antennas are shell-like remnants with guts removed and copper wiring scavenged.

While locals are fond of the site as a permanent fixture in the view to the north, not all are enamored and see the site not as art, but just more debris along with junk metal strewn across the tundra from early mining operations. SNC sees it as an ongoing expense and liability.

Some Nomeites worked on the construction or maintenance of the White Alice site-among them, Chuck Reader, the late Tommy Johnson and Jim West Sr.

West helped do the paint job, according to his son Robert, visiting Nome several years ago

Robert West visited the Anvil Mountain site.

'What a magnificent site!" he said-"all the time, remembering that painting the towers was the reason Jim Sr. first visited Nome, loved it, and spent 45 more hustlin' years

Robert West suggested at least one of the towers be made into a lighthouse as a historical monument, 'providing a clear and strong beacon to future residents and travelers."

The SNC land committee plans to meet again to consider the next step in dealing with White Alice.

tally stripped," he said. "I can imagine they were eating and suddenly there was a dog there.

Game biologists think musk ox attack dogs because they resemble their natural predator, the wolf.

What did Erickson do after he took the wounded dog to be put out of its misery?

"I started looking for fireworksyou can put this in the paper—I went to Leo Rasmussen [fireworks vendor] to see if he had some left from Fourth of July," Erickson said.

Erickson obtained a bottle rocket and several other fireworks.

He did not end up setting off the fireworks to scare away the musk ox. He was advised against appearing to be harassing wildlife.

But Erickson proposed a solution. We need to have a bow and arrow hunt in the city limits."

That would decrease numbers where the terrain is attractive for the lack of musk ox predators, Erickson thinks, plus provide meat for some families.

We need to urge the local game advisory committees to put forth and advocate a proposal for a bow hunt in Game Management 22C," Erickson said.

The State Deot Fish and Game has already set up a bow hunt near Nome, to decrease the chance of bullets zinging through the air in the populated area, according ADF&G biologist Tony Gorn.

State Dept. of Fish and Game laws allow one bull to be taken by bow or muzzleloader in the open season from Jan. 1 to March 15 by permit only. The legal area is in GMU 22C in the "portion of the Snake River drainage downstream of the Glacier Creek confluence and including the Glacier Creek drainage, that portion of the Nome River drainage downstream of and including the Basin Creek and Shepard Creek drainages, and all drainages flowing directly to Norton Sound between the mouths of the Nome River and the Snake River," according to ADF&G regulations.

Only residents are eligible for this hunt. It is a Tier II subsistence hunt with special qualifications to allow one permit per household. Hunting is not allowed within Nome's city

Game biologists estimate there are more than 3,000 of the shortlegged shaggy animals on the Seward Peninsula stemming from 35 animals transplanted in 1981 at the Port Clarence Coast Guard Station about 100 miles northwest of Nome.

Musk ox delight tourists and camera bearers, but they have become a nuisance in town where they roam freely and have killed and injured dogs in yards of homes and caused concern for the safety of children.

Game managers who have tried a number of measures to deter musk ox or move them away from people to no avail advise establishing fences to shut out musk ox. Erickson agrees

"We need a bow and arrow hunt and solar-powered electric fences,

Indeed, the musk ox maraud during the summer when the Seward Peninsula enjoys 24 hours of potential solar energy. With the coming of winter, the musk ox customarily move out of town to higher eleva-

Meanwhile, the musk ox continue to multiply while the solution to musk ox and people vying for the same habitat remains elusive.

Public Health tests miners for mercury

By Diana Haecker

In reaction to what is perceived as the new Nome Gold Rush and anecdotal reports of mercury found in Nome, Alaska Division of Public Health officials traveled to Nome last week to offer tests to gold miners who may have been exposed to mercury. Environmental Public Health program manager Ali Hamade, Ph.D., and a crew of four other officials were in Nome from Wednesday through Saturday to take voluntary urine samples from gold miners at Public Health but they also took their work to West Beach and the newly sprouted gold miner's campground at Dredge 6. "We wanted to see what's out there and provide educational materials about mercury," Hamade said.

Hamade said that they were able to collect 20 urine samples. "For the most part, the miners were helpful and cooperative," Hamade said.

Hamade said that the officials asked miners if they have been finding gold-mercury amalgams, and of those who did, he asked them for urine samples. He said the elementary mercury, or metallic mercury. stays in the urine for a week or longer, hence they ask for urine samples and not blood samples. "In the blood, levels peak after one day of exposure and then it rapidly comes down," explains Hamade.

Mercury binds to gold and it is a common practice for small scale miners to use mercury to separate gold from the ore. When the mercury-gold amalgam is then heated up to free it from the gold, toxic vapors are released that are dangerous as they can cause permanent brain, kidney and lung damage. Children and pregnant women are at highest risk to develop lasting damage from mercury exposure. Mercury, if released into the environment also poses a hazard. As the vapors are released be the next U.S. president, it is likely that strict coastal management measures would be loosened to accommodate economic growth and resource exploitation.

At the same time, the Alaska Sea Party, the organizers of the campaign to reinstate a meaningful ACMP, said that not all is lost. "Significant statewide support for our proposal tells me Alaskans want some form of coastal management program back," said Alaska Sea Party co-chair Terzah Tippin Poe. "This is not the end of the quest to restore Alaska's voice in coastal development decisions. All through the campaign, our opponents said again and again they coastal management, just not this particular plan. We're going to hold them to that. We're ready to work with them to bring back the coastal management program.' Juneau Mayor Botelho, Bruce also co-chair of the Alaska Sea Party, said the party will remain active in seeking restoration of the program. "The need still exists," Botelho said, "and Alaskans still want a voice in development decisions along their coastline. The Sea Party will remain active and will work with all interested parties to promote Alaska involvement in coastal management. This effort is far from over.'

As 59 out of 60 seats in the Alaska Legislature are up for election due to redistricting, the next steps are mere speculation. If Senator Olson remains in the Senate, he is prepared to be involved to introduce an

ACMP bill again. Political alliances may change as new legislators may bring a bush-friendly perspective into play. For example, former commissioner of Labor and Workforce Development Click Bishop of Fairbanks is knowledgeable of rural affairs and he defeated fellow Republican Ralph Seekins. However, with House District 40 Representative Reggie Joule not running for re-election, the ACMP has lost a vocal supporter. Four Democrats vied for Joule's seat in the primary with no Republican running for Dismunities," said Nome City Manager Josie Bahnke. But she said there is also hope. "I agree with Bruce Botelho that there is still hope for a resolution and that's what we want to focus on. There was an effort and hard work to get this on the ballot. Now it's time to roll up our sleeves and work harder," Bahnke said. She added that the City would support any legislation introduced to reinstate the ACMP. Other election results In the race for U.S. Representa-

Court clicks the lock on DNR offshore leases

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Alaska Superior Court has thrown a dispute concerning Nome area lease tracts coveted by offshore gold miners back to the commissioner of the state Dept. of Natural Resources.

The decision locks up the 12 leases while the commissioner takes another look at a decision to award the leases to the highest bidders in last fall's Sept. 28 auction following withdrawal of an appeal on one

Mike Benchoff and Solomon Gold, a corporation formed in September by Robert Retherford to bid in the auction, both bid on Tracts 18, 20, 22 and 39. Benchoff cast the higher bid on the four tracts by $500 to $1,000 and was declared the successful bidder.

In subsequent appeals Solomon Gold has attempted to knock Benchoff off the tracts and has attempted unsuccessfully to buy the tracts from Benchoff.

Following a summer of court filings, Solomon Gold has secured a ruling from the court that stays the award of the leases in question and refers the case back to DNR.

The background story begins shortly after the auction.

Brent Goodrum, director of the DNR Division of Mining, Land and Water, held in October that two winning miners—Scott Meisterheim and Michael Benchoff, whose qualifying statements of citizenship and age were not found on file following the Sept. 28 tract lease auction, could submit the documents within 10 In that determination, Goodrum stated that "in considering the omissions of the two bidders, it appears that there may have been some misunderstanding during the sign-in process the day of the sale that contributed to the incomplete bids. Consequently, the omissions are determined to be due to excusable inadvertence.'

Norm Stiles of Nome appealed Goodrum's determination on the missing statements. He was secondhighest bidder on a tract won by Meisterheim. This tied up about a dozen tracts upon which Benchoff and Meisterheim had bids pending Sullivan's ruling on the issue. In January, Commissioner Dan Sullivan acknowledged Stiles' appeal and notified all bidders on tracts bid by Benchoff and Meisterheim. He said that any bidders who wanted to join had to respond by Feb. 17. Solomon Gold submitted a letter.

In February, Meisterheim notified the DNR that he had withdrawn his bid in favor of Stiles, who then agreed to recall his appeal. DNR staff made clear that the agreement was between the parties and accepted the withdrawal of Stiles appeal and the withdrawal of Meisterheim's bid on Tract 4.

Sullivan on May 14 closed Stiles' appeal and signaled the Division of Mining, Land and Water to begin processing documents and bid results on affected tracts and ruled the miners' post-auction statements of qualifications to be good. However, Sullivan said that Alaska law permitted an appellant affected by the administrative order and decision to appeal to the Superior Court within 30 days.

Solomon Gold filed an administrative appeal on the deadline June 13. In negotiations with Benchoff just after June 13, Solomon Gold offered to buy Tract 39 upon which Benchoff had highest bid. Upon successful purchase of Tract 39 and options on other tracts held by Benchoff, Solomon Gold would withdraw the June 13 administrative appeal. The sale was not successful. Solomon Gold went forward with the appeal.

Another investor, Bill Patz of Pacifica Marine, made a deal with Benchoff on Tract 39.

During the latest appeal, Solomon Gold has argued that while DNR had claimed that Tract 4 was the only tract that was subject to appeal, the state's actions were not consistent in communications and conduct with bidders during the course of the Stiles appeal.

"DNR consistently treated the appeal in which Solomon Gold was invited to participate as including issues relating to both Benchoff and Meisterheim, as well as a variety of tracts other than Tract 4," Solomon Gold said in a motion to stay the auction results and send the issue back to DNR.

Solomon Gold additionally argued that the appeal process had given Benchoff an extension of the 30-deadline paying for the leases, allowing him additional time to round up investors.

Robert Retherford, majority stockholder in Solomon Gold filed an affidavit that conversations with Benchoff had revealed that Benchoff did not have the money to pay for his tract leases.

"Maybe that was a business strategy," Benchoff said last week.

DNR has maintained in a motion to dismiss the appeal that Solomon Gold had no standing upon which to appeal Sullivan's May 14 action, as the appeal to which it submitted a letter had been closed following Stiles withdrawal of it. DNR also said Solomon Gold had not exhausted all administrative remedies. The only timely appeal had been filed by Stiles, said DNR.

Should the court find that

Solomon Gold had standing to appeal the DNR's acceptance of late qualification documents from Meisterheim and Benchoff, DNR asked the court to dismiss the administrative appeal filed in court and refer the matter to DNR for further appeal processing.

On Aug. 30, Superior Court Judge Jack Smith declared court filings withdrawn and the sent the issue back to DNR. He directed the DNR to decide on the merits of whether DNR properly provided bidders in the Nome Offshore Mining Lease Sale with an opportunity to correct the failure to submit a statement of qualifications form and to consider arguments Solomon Gold filed in court and in its letter to DNR in February appealing DNR's decision to accept qualification statements submitted by Meisterheim and Ben-

Smith's ruling reinstated the October lockup of lease tracts 1, 5, 6, 13, 16, 18, 19, 20, 22, 28, 36 and 39. Kerwin Krause, DNR land manager, said last week it was possible the DNR could decide to withdraw the disputed tract leases from the sale, throwing the deadbolt on them for as long as 10 years until the next DNR tract lease auction.

Nome Airport runway opened up again temporarily

By Diana Haecker

The Dept. of Transportation and Public Facilities opened up the main runway at the Nome Airport again as the work crew waits for a crucial piece of equipment to arrive on the next mainline barge.

The runway is under emergency repair, due to a dip at the West end that progressively got worse due to settling of gravel underneath the as-

The emergency repair began on August 13. The contractor so far has installed a culvert, storm drains and performed necessary survey work, said DOT spokeswoman Meadow Bailey. The runway re-opened on August 25 because the contractor is waiting for a special dynamic compaction crane that was shipped from Fairbanks, to arrive in Nome via

The repair of the dip in the runway, caused by settling of the gravel underneath, is to be achieved by a process called dynamic compaction. Bailey explained that the crane is needed to drop a large block of concrete onto material to compact the

While she couldn't give a date when the runway will close again and hence delegate jet traffic to the North-South runway – she said that the barge was supposed to arrive in mid-September. "We don't know the exact date, but a few days before the crane arrives, the runway will be closed again to allow the contractor to cut out the concrete," said Bailey.

The runway closure in combination with persistent rainy and foggy weather had caused delayed jet service in and out of Nome.

The alternative runway, the northsouth runway, can only be approached from the south and jet planes need seven miles visibility to be able to land.

Lisa Coyle, P.E. with the DOT gave the following updates on other DOT projects.

The Nome-Council highway repair project progresses, but near the end of the road to 62 mile, there are rough patches and 4-wheel drive is needed. Improvements from mile 62 to 64 make the road passable compared to early August.

Work on the emergency repair from the November 2011 Storm progressed to the point that the road can be driven with a 2-wheel drive with some soft spots between mile 16 and 34. Closer to town, between mile 4 to mile 16 the road is reduced to single lane traffic through Hastings Creek, where the cuts are being filled in with material.

Coyle reports that the rain had rutted the road in places and the DOT recommends to drive slow.

In town, the Snake River Bridge Replacement project is progressing and workers are finishing piles on the second pier. The rock sockets have been grouted but the piles still needs concrete and rebar on the inside. The contractor has moved to install the third pier, the template is set and they are starting to drive the casing for the pile. The abutment at Jafet Drive is complete and the H piles are

Unalakleet held first land lottery

By Jeff Erickson

The Unalakleet Bingo Hall regularly resonates with the call of "B-"N-34!" and the resulting "BINGO!" It had never held the nervous expectations that were present there the night of August 15 as a large group of Unalakleet residents gathered at the Gonongan/Paneok Community Center for the first Unalakleet land lottery.

The City of Unalakleet had surveyed 25 lots on the hill outside town for immediate sale to help with the limited housing availability in the current community location. This Phase One Subdivision Land Sale focused on a target group of younger residents who were looking to build homes in the near future. All defined residents were eligible to be entered into a lottery with immediate payment required and building to commence within the next three years.

More than 50 applications were initially received with that group being sorted into two eligible groups. Those with current local real estate were placed in "Tier 2" and the others were entered into the initial offering. Twenty-eight "Tier 1" applicants held their respective Bingo balls with anticipation as the night began.

The lots were put in order of desirability based on lot surveys gathered in the application process. The top lot would go first. Almost all eligible entrants jumped at the opportunity to get this roadside lot, each holding their breath as the balls bounced around in the machine. "B-3" showed up on the TV monitor and local author, Matt Roesch and his wife Tera Cunningham were the proud owners of the first lot.

The lottery continued until there were no more interested takers and 14 new landowners left the hall smiling at their new property and the prospects of a new home. The lots were offered for $3,000 per acre, with most lots being one-acre

Man medevaced from Shell drill ship Noble Discoverer

A Coast Guard helicopter crew medevaced a 59-year-old man from the drillship Noble Discoverer in NortonSound, 68 miles west of Nome, on Wednesday, August 29.

The Coast Guard 17th District command center in Juneau received a request for the medevac from the crew of the drillship at about 4 a.m. The crew reported the man was suffering from an irregular heartbeat but was stable.

The Coast Guard duty flight surgeon was consulted and concurred with the need for the medevac. The Coast Guard MH-65 Dolphin helicopter crew, attached to the Coast Guard Cutter Alex Haley which was anchored off Nome, was dispatched from Nome at about 7:52 a.m. They arrived on scene about 30 minutes later, landed on the helipad and embarked the patient. The Noble Discoverer is a 514foot drillship from Seattle under contract to Shell. The Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement last week allowed Shell to move forward with preparatory activities in the Chukchi Sea.

Shell is authorized to drill and set the first two strings of casing into shallow non-oil-bearing zones. Shell is required to receive certification of its containment system, which is designed to capture flowing liquid hydrocarbons in the event of a loss of well control by the U.S. Coast Guard and have the vessel positioned in the Arctic before any drilling into oilbearing zones can occur. Shell has yet to secure the final Coast Guard certification for its oil spill response barge Arctic Challenger.

Greenpeace deputy campaigns director Dan Howells criticized Interior Secretary Ken Salazar for allowing Shell's preparatory work. "Allowing Shell to begin its work before the Arctic Challenger is fully certified and in place, is setting a terrible precedent of lax regulations for Arctic drilling," he said.

Governor Sean Parnell welcomed the news that Shell has the green light to proceed with prep work.

In a press release out of the Governor's office, Parnell repeated verbatim the following wording out of a Shell statement: "Shell has dedicated more than six years to gain the confidence and trust of regulators and to earn to the right to begin this historic

We appreciate the effort the Department of Interior has made to understand, scrutinize, and support this project of national significance.'

Hamade said that this was the first time that a team was dispatched from their Anchorage offices to collect samples for mercury. School board receives good fiscal news

The Nome Board of Education received good news from Paula Coffman, business manager, at their August 28 work session. Coffman presented budget revisions, which included monies from the City of Nome to cover specific line items: $21,000 for curriculum development; $8,750 for dual credit expense; $40,000 for iPads; $16,500 for student travel to state events: $7.500 for the student breakfast program and $150,000 for the Elementary School gym floor.

The revisions also included a donation from CHARR for $25,000 to cover student travel to state events and state funding to cover capital improvements including an $81,928 fire alarm project.

Coffman noted that, with the revisions, the budget drew closer to the highly elusive goal of 70 percent of the budget spent on instruction - rising from 65.6 percent to 67.7 per-

Student Count

Nome Public Schools Superintendent Michael Brawner calling the count a "moving target," announced a 708-student count total at the time of the work session. Board president Betsy Brennan commented that it was up from the projected 680 students budgeted. If the student total remains high through the 20-school day count period in October the FY13 budget will enjoy a boost in state funding.

Brawner explained that two of last year's priorities could be removed from the school board's list of four priorities: the Elementary gym floor replacement was funded by the city and the LED lighting upgrade at the Elementary School, which was funded through an NSEDC grant. The Elementary School has its new LED lights and the gym floor materials are on their way.

A fire protection system for the Anvil City Science Academy (ACSA), estimated at $283,000 last year as a legislative priority, is now to be considered by the board as phase 1 of a three-phase priority. A newly submitted 95 percent design estimates phase 1 at a cost of $410,000. However, due to the fact that the areas are used for educational purposes, phase 1 would qualify for State grant support at 70 or 80 percent, according to Brawner. Phase 2, estimated at $78,969, and phase 3, estimated at $330,710, are not mandatory and would protect other areas in the building surrounding ACSA that are "residential in nature," including the superintendent's apartment, itinerant housing and dorm area.

The final priority, direct digital controllers, which would replace outof-date analog control systems and produce energy and cost savings in the Beltz building, among other things, would cost the school district approximately $614,261 according to a recent cost estimate.

A new legislative priority was presented to the board and summarized as "Academic Support Systems." It included four components: 1) Pre-Kindergarten (est. cost $100,000) service for children who remain on the Pre-K waiting list. 2) Remediation Reading Program (est. cost $20,000) - reading materials and professional development for students performing significantly below grade-level. 3) Instructional Technology (est. cost $70,000) - implementation of items such as iPad, iTouch, Interactive White Boards, eTextbooks, etc. and professional development. 4) Drop-Out Prevention and Credit Recovery (est. cost $80,000) - staff position to assist with credit recovery, student counseling services and family advocacy programs.

Transition Class

The Nome Elementary School did not hold back any Kindergarteners from the previous school year. However, ten students were placed in a 1st grade "transition class." The benefits include a reduced class size because all other 1st grade classes have approximately 17 students; each student has an iPad; they receive extra time with Reading Mastery; and are "focusing on catch-up growth," according to Brawner. NES Principal Bob Grimes explained to The Nome Nugget that the class starts with an accelerated kindergarten curriculum and steadily moves the students to 2nd grade preparation by the end of the school year.

Partner in Education award

Tyler Rhodes, NSEDC Communications Director, accepted a Partner in Education award from Nome Public Schools acknowledging NSEDC for its partnership with NPS and continued support of the Culture Camp.

Special Session

The board took action on two items: the ACSA Charter School contract and one kindergarten teacher's contract.

ACSA is required to apply to the State every five years and the approved contract with NPS would be a part of the State application. ACSA Principal and teacher Todd Hindman explained that the updated contract tidied up language, changed the dates to extend another five years and was only a "first step" to actually increasing the student enrollment at the Charter School from 44 to 66, which was the major change in the contract.

The contract for Jennifer Beltz, a new kindergarten teacher, was approved as well. No known relation to William E. Beltz, she hails from White Bear Lake and attended Bethel University in Minnesota. "Obviously I was meant to be here!" states Ms. Beltz. The school board will meet next on September 11 in a regular meeting.

By Nome Police Chief John Papasodora

The days of the midnight sun have passed us by and as we head into the fall, hours of daylight are growing shorter. As a reminder, it is required that headlights are illuminated on motor vehicles one-half hour before sunrise; within one-half hour of sunset; or at any time visibility or lighting reduce clear visibility to less than 1,000 feet (fog, blowing snow, dust, etc). The lighting requirements imposed by administrative code are in place to insure that all motorists can see other motorists and pedestrians and to avoid low visibility collisions. Though most modern vehicles are equipped with a smart lighting system, the best rule is to manually turn on your lights and drive with headlights on at all times.

Take a few moments to check all of your lights to make sure they are working. Having all of your lights working increases your visibility and may help prevent a crash. Your Nome police officers will be conducting traffic enforcement to bring lighting deficiencies to your attention and issuing correctable citations to insure lighting issues are taken care of. We want you to be visible and safe while driving in Nome.

In combination with our reduced hours of daylight and the start of school, all pedestrians should have some type of reflective material on their jacket, boots and backpack. Headlights in combination with reflective material increases the visibility of pedestrians and alerts motorists to the presence of pedestrians in the area. If possible, parents should buy outer clothing and backpacks that incorporate reflective material to increase the visibility of their children while walking near roadways. If unable to purchase reflective gear, the Norton Sound Regional Hospital operates an injury prevention program and provides access to reflective material, helmets and other safety aides. Kendra Nichols-Takak is the NSHC Injury Prevention coordinator and can be reached at ktakak@nshcorp.org. Kendra has been very responsive in meeting community safety needs. Finally, integrating both of the major concerns above is the need to be extra vigilant as the seasons change and children return to school. The roads will be getting progressively slicker as the temperatures dip. With our rainy fall time, this could happen any day. Now is the time to commit to taking your time and making sure everyone stays safe. Give yourself plenty of time to fully stop at stop signs; leave adequate following distance to stop for vehicles in front of you; and allow pedestrians to be well clear of the roadway before proceeding. Don't be in a hurry and watch your speed - particularly in school zones; and remember that if you are late, trying to save a couple of minutes by speeding and driving in a rush could cost you and many other people tears and tragedy.

enhancement in the Norton Sound region. Rather than just talk about it or complain about others, NSEDC will continue to actually work and play a role in this arena.

NSEDC does not have all the answers and does not claim the ability to do it alone. We welcome and encourage partnerships with entities to operate salmon restoration and enhancement projects and programs in our region. The NSEDC board has a significant history of partnering with other entities in fisheries programs, believing that such projects are worth the cost and effort if ADF&G will allow them and they have a reasonable chance of success. And that's the truth.

Sincerely. Dan Harrelson, NSEDC Board Chairman White Mountain, Alaska

Dear Nancy,

Musk-Ox vs. Nome Residents vs. Tourism vs. A Solution

We need to solve the problem of musk ox attacking people's pets.

There are people here who believe the local musk ox have turned goring tied up dogs and then tossing them into the air into something of a recreational blood sport over the last few years.

I am of the persuasion that if musk ox have such a hard time distinguishing between pets and wolves that musk ox should never be allowed the close access to pets they now enjoy.

Some would explain the most likely reason musk ox wander off their feeding grounds with no immediate provocation from wolves or bears or hunters, to cross busy highways, to casually stroll by peo-ple making all kinds of man-made distractions and then continue on into the very heart of our towns to gore tied up dogs with carnivorous fervor is because musk ox are just reacting to their history with wolves attacking them for food. I don't think this is the case.

It makes more sense the musk ox have been allowed to feel too safe near us and our homes. While it is true that musk ox are cute and a tourist attraction, I doubt it's worth the life of one tied up pet which happens to fall victim to a goring attack. Grizzly bears have done far less damage to our community than musk ox and the bears that threaten us are shot instantly. Why do we not have the same policy with musk ox? I believe we have all been asleep at the wheel to have let the sometimes very passive appearing musk ox become so accepted.

I believe Fish and Game's policy of handling the management of musk ox close to citizens is to not manage the animals at all but to just wait and see what happens when the local citizens are forced to deal with problem musk-ox by themselves. What I am getting from Fish and Game is a feeling of helplessness that there isn't much that can be done about the problem. It's basically just that you have the right of defense of life and property. It goes like this "Shoot the darn thing. But you have to responsibly harvest the meat. And then call us...so we can tell you which charitable organization to which you have to deliver the meat. And by the way you may get a ticket." Don't get me wrong I am not upset with Fish and Game. If I was employed by the state, I would probably say the same thing. But, I disagree with the policy.

It shouldn't be that home owners inside the city limits who have no training to deal with the stress of their pet being gored to also be expected to be responsible enough to shoot to kill a musk ox while at the same time ensuring the bullet or bullets also don't inadvertently kill another human being in the house next door. I thought it was against the law for people to shoot guns within the city limits in the first place. If this is so, why are the authorities allowing people and people's pets to be put at such great risk and then put the onus on the average resident to make the difficult decision on whether to use deadly force when they are not trained to do so? Is the reason tourism?

Up here at the base of the Anvil Mountain road and right on the edge of city limits, I've had musk ox chase our dogs right up to the door of our house. I've reached over the deck and pulled my children up because musk ox walked around the corner of our house unexpectedly. Every spring, for weeks, my kids are house bound because the musk ox have taken over our lawn and surrounding neighborhood. Three neighbors within a rock's throw have had their dogs attacked also. One dog was killed. The neighbors across the valley have also had numerous musk ox attacking dog incidents. The musk ox have become so comfortable around humans that they have even come under the deck of our house and gotten their horns hooked on my ham radio antenna wires subsequently ripping my radio across my desk and into the wall. This has happened three times. And, yes, it gets old and expensive.

I believe the solution to our musk ox problem is first to admit it is a very real problem and then to make drastic changes in our musk ox policy. I believe we need to make it very clear to musk ox that it is a very, very bad idea to get too close to humans and their homes. I propose that musk ox that wander into town or too close to people's homes get marked by a non-lethal paint gun. Then Fish and Game should either move the animal to the end of the road system or destroy the offenders themselves, gut them themselves, and donate the meat to charities of their own choice. This would certainly be preferable to having untrained citizens shooting firearms where others may become injured. It would be easy enough to have the police department outfitted with paint ball marking guns and have them, trained professionals, professionally and safely mark the animals when citizens report musk ox being too close. If Fish and Game doesn't like the idea of shooting and processing the meat themselves then they can start a special hunt for marked musk ox and then supervise the safe shooting and recovery of the meat. This should go on until the musk ox learn that the city life just isn't what it used to be.

One thing is certain. If nothing is done to permanently make musk ox move away from being this close to people, there is going to be some serious loss of life or injury to someone because our community hasn't dealt with a very serious problem. It should be more important to protect the health and welfare of our citizens and their pets than to suffer the consequences of providing a birdseye view of pre-historic musk ox. I believe that with a little positive community urging of our community leaders and our fellow brothers and sisters over at Fish and Game that we can solve the musk ox problem.

Dear Editor,

The review of how important teaching reading to children has been an "AHA" moment for me personally and professionally. I have thought about my grandmother who was not educated and did not learn how to read, and my youngest children who are in the process of learning to Decoding is very important for a child to know in order to proceed in their education to be engaged rather then disengaged in school. It is important to help students who have not reached their full potential so that they don't go down the Matthew's Effect but rather go up it.

My grandmother grew up at Egavik, and had never attended school. She was 87 years old when she passed away. In her 70's she had asked me to teach her how to read because I began my job here at the school. Today, when I learned about Multisyllabic Word Reading: and teaching/learning to divide the word and figure it out, decoding big words and breaking them into syllables, analyzing morphemes (meaningful parts of words) and understanding vocabulary, I am sure that I would have been able to teach her how to read. Although she is not here today, I have a 5, 6, and 7 year old whom can help figure it out at home.

Personally, I will ask more questions about the content of what my child is reading to build motivation and engagement in their reading. I need to be more interactive with my child in their reading,

The extra help for these students are also available with strategies such as foundations, 6-minute solutions, and other tutoring. Extra activities are provided to help teach students the area they need help in. This past year, AIMS Web was implemented in our school, and with it, it has helped target my own 7 -year old child and help us be-come more aware of where she needed improvement. Thank God for people who know they can make a difference in a child and care about their outcome as an adult. It is reassuring to know that we are not giving up on our children and continue to help them in areas needed to help them comprehend what they are reading and teaching them to read.

Jolene Nanouk Unalakleet, Alaska Greetings to The Nome Nugget,

I was recently in Nome and picked up a copy of The Nome Nugget. I was surprised to see the photo on page #5 of the recently purchased ambulance for the City of Nome. I am/was the "3rd party inspector" referred to in the article.

As the Service Manager for Braun Northwest, I came up to Nome from Chehalis Washington to make a complete inspection of this ambulance for the City of Nome. This was completed under the watchful eye of Matt Johnson owner of Nome Machine Works on behalf of the

This vehicle was given a clean bill of health by Braun N.W. and turned over to the City of Nome. It should be mentioned here that the shipper neglected to wrap this vehicle even though it was clearly placarded stating the vehicle should be wrapped prior to shipping.

Although the innocent 3rd party caught in the middle of this error by the shipper, Braun N.W. made several concessions to the City of Nome to assure their complete confidence in Braun N.W. as the builder along with complete satisfaction and acceptance of the new vehicle. Any details of these concessions should be obtained from the City of Nome and Matt Johnson, Please feel free to contact me with any questions, thanks.

the AKAu Gold and Resort at mile 3 of the old Glacier Creek Road.

WORKING THE SLUICE BOX (right) — Pennsylvania visitors Dan and Leslie Green had a blast working the sluice box during their one-day mining experience at AKAu Gold resort in August.

Gold resort offers real mining experience to visitors

Story and photos by Diana Haecker

They broke a sweat, shoveled for hours, kneeled in the dirt and froze their hands in the cool waters running off Anvil Creek. It's not easy being a gold miner, even if it's only for one sunny day. But the reward looms after a few hours' worth of work. Wearing a big smile from ear to ear, visitors Dan and Leslie Green from central Pennsylvania, looked on in astonishment as their host and AKAu gold resort owner Augie Krutzsch coaxed flakes of gold from the dirt by washing the paydirt in a gold pan. In the end, the color showed in the small vial that now sits on a mantelpiece in Pennsylvania, a conversation piece that will result in the story being told over and over again of how the Greens gold mined, just like the three lucky Swedes, at the historic Anvil Creek site in Nome, Alaska.

These are the kind of memories that Augie Krutzsch and his mother Betty Krutzsch-Johnson had in mind when they decided to open their gold mine to visitors and tourists instead of exploiting the gold resource for themselves. This year marked the first year of their business, called AKAu Gold and Resort. "As long as I can remember, we've been mining here, all my life," remembers Augie Krutzsch. Augie began his long career as a miner at the tender age of 2. From 1983 through 2003 the Krutzsch's mined their claim at Anvil Creek, on scenic 160 acres of land that offers mind-boggling views of the Snake River valley and is rife with historic features such as the Wild Goose railroad and the Dexter rail station. "But I wanted to open the mine to tourists, so that they get a chance to see what gold mining is all about." The Krutzsch's offer a bed and breakfast arrangement, with visitors having the choice to stay in one of the four two-bed hootches, or two 16 ft. by 16 ft. cabins for families. The mining visitors can try their hand mining with pan and shovel, run a sluice box or walk the paydirt with a metal detector. Earlier this summer, Colorado visitor Joe Fortunato ended up with three gold nuggets that he found metal detecting at the AKAu gold camp. Yes, and the visitors are allowed to keep their find, no strings attached.

Once visitors have decided which mining method to tackle, Augie Krutzsch gives a short crash course and helps the novices. The Greens decided they'd like to try their hand on running the sluice box. No problem. Krutzsch gets the front end loader and delivers a big pile of paydirt directly to the sluice box, turns on the water pump and Leslie, shovel in hand, is ready to run the material through the sluice box. Dan jokes that, luckily, they're in good shape for the hard work as they just recently helped a neighbor shovel some garden soil. After a few hours, they're ready for the big "cleanup" and Krutzsch shares some secrets of the trade, empties the sluice box, takes out the carpet and begins washing the fine stuff in a gold pan. Ah, and there it is. Gold. "This is the real deal," said Dan Green, smiling. "It's really special to meet with a real mining family and get to mine and even find some real gold, all that exceeded my expectations," Green said. "It's neat to see a family run that business and not have a big corporation behind it."

After their mining experience and before being taken back to town, the couple strolled across the front yard and admired a vast collection of miner's relicts from times past, found on the tundra, and arranged like an outdoor museum. Just then a small bus shuffled up the hill, disembarking teenagers on a field trip organized by the Village of Solomon, eager to learn what it meant to be a miner for a day and discover history in their own back yard.

Krutzsch plans to expand the mine "resort" and build a few more cabins to accommodate more guests and families. He said business is starting to pick up as more and more people learn about his camp. So far, 50 guests got to experience the gold resort this summer. Eventually, he Stopped and fined for lacking proof of vehicle insurance or driving with expired license? Money collected from motorists for these and other traffic tickets that has been going to the state would come to Nome with a change in the Code of Ordinances, that passed unanimously to second reading Monday at the Nome Common Council meeting. The City has been eligible to receive the forfeited bail, but needed a change in City law, now proposed.

The Council introduced an ordinance amending the City's tax law. People interested in testifying on taxation of pull-tabs for favorable yield to charities helped fill the Council chamber.

Charities support the City changing the current policy of taxing the gross pull-tab sales to taxing the ideal net from pull-tab sales. The way it is now, the City makes more money on the little paper games than the charities do. Take a box of pull-tabs selling for $5,760. Sales tax to the City on gross sales comes to $264.76. The charity pays that sales tax on the gross sales of $5,760, but it takes the tax and expenses out of what is left—the ideal net—after prizes are subtracted. That's a difference of $96.64. City administrators say a change to ideal net would cost the City $300,000 annually and possibly make property tax rise.

Mayor Denise Michels explained the public process for adopting ordinances.

"We cannot have a discussion on it, we cannot have a vote on it, until it goes through the public process. That process requires five days before we can take action. At the next meeting the Council, if it liked, could amend the ordinance further," she

The public could give opinions Monday night for the Council to consider at the next meeting.

According to Cussy Kauer, the City's financial officer, the 2011 pull-tab tax that flowed into the City's coffers—$422,037—figured on gross sales would have gone down to $126,611 had the tax been on adjusted gross sales.

Kauer spent an hour educating the Council on scenarios and also informing them of slip-slide in reports as well as failure to submit reports to the City. Kauer said that sketchy returns could lead one to believe there had been instances when charities had not received their due, nor had the City received tax on proceeds undocumented on reports.

Her organization was not one of these, Carole Brown said.

Brown, of Nome C.H.A.R., took the podium to say that the organization had given generously from pull tab receipts to a list of charities last year including: scholarships, $25,000 for athletic travel, $10,000 for Bering Sea Women's Shelter, bounce houses for Midnight Sun Festival, two professional volleyball nets for school practice, shoes and uniforms for Tae kwon do youth activities, airfare for men and women's summer sports teams to go to Anchorage.

The Council authorized Kauer to pay for quarterly reports from the state, as some who have not submitted reports to the city have given re-

State to renovate existing State Office Building

By Sandra L. Medearis

Folks who wanted a State building on Front Street are to get their wish.

When the State of Alaska started drawing plans for a new state building at the north end of Steadman Street, a cry arose from Front Street businesses that a site away from Front Street would further devastate the main drag, already deserted by businesses closing or moving.

Sitnasuak Native Corp. feared that it would lose lucrative state of-

Street office building.

Mayor Denise Michels has received an e-mail advising her that for now the State Dept. of Administration has scrapped the new $40 to $60 million building and announced they would renovate the Front Street building. Scrapped along with the building plans was a plan for Sitnasuak Native Corp. to finance and build the new facility.

SNC wanted to build the new facility on a piece of Front Street property that SNC owns across the street from the Board of Trade Saloon. Then they would sell it to the City of Nome immediately after the ribbon-cutting ceremony.

That plan is dead, based on the letter from Dept. of Administration Commissioner Becky Hultberg.

The existing Front Street building has sustained corrosion and water damage from its location a few feet from the seawall separating it from Norton Sound. The facility of 16,000 sq. ft. houses the local offices of State Fish and Game, Health and Social Services and Legislative Infor-

NEST looks at Housing First models for Nome

By Diana Haecker

The suffering that alcohol abuse brings to Nome and the region were raised in last week's meeting of the state Alcohol Beverage Control board in Nome. Five community members testified to the destructive force of binge and under-aged drinking, and the need for more treatment options in Nome. Several Nome organizations are currently working on projects to tackle the alcohol problem from different angles. Norton Sound Health Corporation's Behavioral Health is pursuing a sober housing project and a Wellness Center. Kawerak is working on a three-year study that focuses on underage drinking and adult binge drinking.

One consequence of the destructive force of alcohol abuse is homelessness. Nome doesn't have a typical homeless shelter, where sobriety is required. But it has NEST, short for Nome Emergency Shelter Team, which offers emergency shelter to adults in need of overnight shelter in Nome during winter months. Most guests use the shelter because of the over-consumption of alcohol, while a smaller number of regular guests are also chronically homeless. NEST director Sue Steinacher said only about 10 individuals who visit NEST regularly are homeless year-round in Nome.

A year ago the Alaska Mental Health Trust held a Housing Summit in Nome, to present the community with different types of supportive housing programs for people with physical and mental disabilities, including chronic alcoholism, and to offer examples of solutions that worked in other parts of the country.

They presented the 'Housing First' model, an approach that offers permanent housing to chronic inebriates, not as a treatment facility, but a safe housing situation.

During the Housing Summit the Alaska Mental Health Trust facilitators also urged Nome to create its own housing coalition to address Nome's housing situation and explore the various housing options that might be funded in Nome. A group of concerned locals have met several times, but have not yet formed a formal coalition.

The Alaska Mental Health Trust invited Sue Steinacher to join a Juneau group traveling to Minnesota last week for a tour of Housing First facilities and to listen to presentations of those who had experienced the relief that such a facility brings to a community.

Letters -

To the editor,

I like to read The Nome Nugget and try to get one every Thursday. Lately I don't want to buy one. Why? I am tired of the letters that Tim Smith writes about NSEDC. How can a person be so negative about someone who is helping our communities?

I guess Tim is so blinded for the power he wants that he does not see the good NSEDC does for our communities.

Example: yearly benefits shares without the benefits shares our villages wouldn't be able to purchase fuel for our city buildings, offering jobs to our young people to work at their fish plants. Giving scholarships to our young men and women to get higher education. These are just a few to mention; that I've seen NSEDC does that Tim should see, instead of the negative things he writes about.

Tim you are a broken record. Remember the 45 and 33 ½ records? When they are scratched they repeat over and over until someone fixes them? You, Tim, are a scratched record and stuck on all the negative things you write about NSEDC, and they are boring.

My advice to you, start writing positive things about NSEDC or things around you that has happened. Better yet-go to church and hear the good news about God. That should soften your heart and your way of thinking. When we focus on too much negative—our hearts get

I remain, Bernadette Joe St. Michael, AK 99659

Hello out there,

I hope your fall is going well. Although we are tired of rain, the water sustains everything, so we should be thankful for the water we're getting.

Once again it's voting time again, so I get a little upset about some of the things it entails. Like-I wanted to vote for Don Young and Donny Olson, couldn't do that because they are on two different ballots. What happened to them all being on one ballot? We, the voters, are supposed to be able to pick who we think we want to represent us, not have to choose these people that are on either the Republican of Democratic ballot. By having them on different ballots, not only are they wasting paper-creating more trash, but they are also violating our Freedom to vote, and your vote does countso vote

Along with-I thought the people we vote into office (like BSNC), ran for office, so they could benefit the corporation/shareholders in some way, not for the money.

Yet, have you seen how much money they pay themselves/each other? I thought the extra monies were supposed to be for the dividends the shareholders are supposed to get, or scholarships, or even buildings that would eventually give the shareholders a pay out, not to line one or two people's pockets. If I was those people I'd be ashamed to show my face, to have people see how greedy I actually am. I know if I was in office I'd only let them give me the pay I think I contributed to that to that company and use the left over on something worth while.

Remember, the kids need their beauty sleep, so make sure they go to bed earlier. Tell them once they pass a Standard it should be easy to pass it again, and they can go on to something else.

Take care you all. Winter's coming, so please dress appropriately.

As always, Karen Nanouk P.O. Box 282 Unalakleet, AK 99684

Thankful for No Trees

Nome has survived many powerful storms and thankfully we are prepared to withstand whatever Mother Nature throws our way. We have endured some mighty powerful winds, yet we are so lucky we don't have to deal with uprooted trees, broken limbs, branches hitting houses and downing power lines.

The city of Anchorage got hit this past week with a storm of historic proportions. Thousands of trees were knocked down, causing countless power outages that took several days to repair. Warnings were issued but fell on inattentive ears. Many were caught unprepared. Nomeites can be proud of the fact that we listen to weather warnings and most of us have flashlights and an emergency plan.

Thankfully Nome also has an effective planning group, the Local Emergency Planning Committee (LEPC) that sets up a command center that is prepared to see us through the emergency situation. We are fortunate to have such a dedicated and talented group of Nomeites. We are also lucky that we live on tundra with no big trees. — N.L.M.-

Dear Nancy, I've learned to take letters from Dan Harrelson over the years with a grain of salt. I am implicated in all the accusations he writes about through my role as the Secretary/Treasurer of the Nome Fishermen's Association. He is calling me a crook and I'm not going to take it lying down!

What Dan Harrelson, Janis Ivanoff, Kyan Olanna and several others don't seem to understand is that they are not NSEDC. NSEDC represents the people of Norton Sound. We are NSEDC. We own NSEDC. We have given this group the trust to manage our CDQ money for the best interest of all residents of our region. We have a right to voice our opinions to the governing body, the Board of Directors of NSEDC. It's very sad that Dan, Janis, Kyan

A Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director,

Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum The Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum continues the look back at the 1900 Nome Gold Rush with more perspective from Wilfred A. McDaniel Sr. We present excerpts from "Alaska Beckons" written by Wilfred, now Sr., in 1943. His love of Nome is quite evident in that his experiences in this exquisite land are still fresh in his mind fortythree years later. There was no National Weather Service back then, no satellite imagery to warn of an impending storm. Storms just "happened" with no advance notice, particularly if they sprung up in the dark of night. Let's let Wilfred Jr. explain.

Alaska beckons By Wilfred A. McDaniel Sr.

During the last week in August 1900, after a particularly cold night, we were surprised to find the ground frozen hard and the hills white with the first snow of approaching winter! The cold snap continued for a few days, some snow falling on the beach and tundra.

September came with warmer weather and the usual rains. At the end of the first week rough sea and strong south-east winds again arose, hampering our work and causing loss of valuable time. Profiting by past experience we took more precautions for the safety of sluice-boxes and equipment. moving them out of reach of the rising sea. Taking down and re-setting the heavy sluices, the riffles filled with black and ruby sand, caused an additional amount of hard labor.

Weather conditions at this season were most trying and discouraging to the beach miner. The elements seemed to combine with the inhospitable land to render his efforts fruitless. When tumbling breakers and wave-swept beach failed in their efforts, and he still persisted, strong off-shore gales, combined with extremely low tides came to frustrate his plans. The water would recede far beyond its usual level, exposing the shallow sea bottom for hundreds of feet, sand bars would be uncovered, and pumps would be left high and dry, barring further mining until the sea resumed its normal level.

At dawn, on September 9th, 1900, a hard wind from off the sea sprang up, but caused no unusual concern other than the ordinary precautions taken in similar gales. Events during the following twenty-four hours proved how little we know regarding behavior of unknown to the majority of its 15,000 inhabitants, scarcely a year before.

Close to the rise of the low lying tundra a flat bench had been formed by debris from the sea. Driftwood from the Yukon, brought down during the spring freshets and drifting about in the sea had, for centuries, accumulated on the shore, and through action of surf and ice had been pushed far back on the beach. Deposits of sand and earth had buried much of it thus forming a low shelf or bench. It was here that most of the camps were made, being higher ground and seemingly safe from the sea, it afforded the only available camp sites, for the flat, moss-covered tundra beyond was a mass of soggy vegetation, spongy and water filled from the rains and melted snow. It was on this bench that our tent stood, apparently safe upon its dry and level surface.

As the morning passed the velocity of the wind increased steadily, while huge waves, driven landward under its force, washed high up on the beach. Fearing a repetition of previous damage, we worked hastily, stacking sluice-boxes high up on the beach and removing oil barrels and other equipment to a place of safety. The long line of suction pipe was detached from the pump and dragged up on the beach, unjointed and placed on higher ground. Engine and pump could not be moved; so all parts liable to damage were removed for safe keeping.

When evening came the storm had reached hurricane proportions, the sea had already reached the engine and pump, foundations were undermined and the heavy machinery was settling and careening as the water swept around it. The large tent covering the engine for protection against rain, was hurriedly taken down to prevent its being destroyed. Nothing more could be done, but to hope that pump and engine would escape damage from floating stumps and logs being tossed about in the breakers.

The sight of the two large freight lighters pitching crazily in the breakers. grounding momentarily, then carried seaward as the heavy seas surged back, gave us the first intimation that this was no ordinary gale! The surf was filled with debris; crate, boxes and quantities of lumber were thrown up on the beach. indicating that serious damage was resulting to the shipping at Nome.

Night came on with no change in the weather. Driving rain accompanied the gale, beating through the canvas rent, covering bedding and provisions with spray. Under pressure from the wind, the tent gave every indication of leaving us shelterless, but was finally anchored securely with extra ropes and heavy logs placed across the tent ropes, preventing the stakes from pulling out. Weary from all of the exertion, the damp bedding and the roar of the storm did not disturb us for long and sleep soon obliterated the noise of wind and

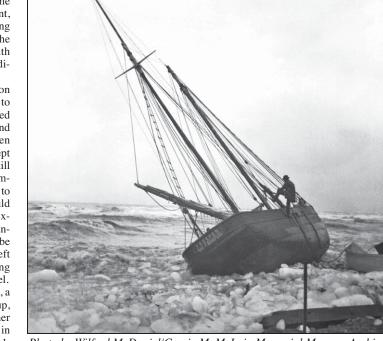

In the early morning hours, shortly after midnight, we were aroused by the slap of water against the end of the tent and the lapping of the back-wash as the water returned! Jumping into our clothes, we dashed out to find the sea piling high on the beach and threatening our tent and all our possessions before it! Moving was almost impossible, but by barricading the end of the tent which faced the sea, with logs and piling sand and gravel on all sides, we prevented it from washing away. Saving the sluice-boxes next took our attention, the sea had already reached them and two were already afloat in the breakers. Several barrels of fuel oil were floating away, but fortunately they were rolled back and we secured them. The sluice-boxes were later found far up the coast, and broken beyond repair. The remaining boxes were rescued and piled high on the tundra with what remained of our outfit. Engine and pump were taking a terrific beating from the surf, being completely submerged at times.

The state has a big stick to encourage timely reporting: delinquent pull-tab permittees cannot buy tabs.

Amendments to the City's sales tax ordinance voted into second reading would give exemptions for sales made to or by construction contractors on state-funded construction projects, and takes away general exemptions on gross receipts derived from retail sales and rentals to nonprofit religious, charitable, cemetery, hospital or education entities unless the buyer has reasonable identification and a certificate of exemption.

Additionally the amended version of Chapter 17 removes a general exemption on gross receipts derived from direct sales and rentals to organizations wholly comprising persons with ninety or more days of active service in the nation's armed services with other than dishonorable discharges or the property of auxiliary organizations.

Except for the above classes, one applying for an exemption must file application paperwork by Jan. 1 of the calendar year—formerly Feb. 1 of the assessment year-for each calendar year for which an exemption is

Should the person wanting an exemption have the deadline waived, and then be approved for exemption, tax already paid would be refunded.

Further, no person could lawfully engage in retail sales as a seller without an annual sales tax license or, additionally in the new sales tax measure, a transient merchant license or an annual motorbus, chauffeur's or taxicab license. Under the amendments, the fee for the first application would go up to $25 from the current

A proposed provision of the amended tax ordinance would reward businesses with average sales of less than $5,000 per month to file quarterly returns to the City provided they are current with payment and filings, but that privilege could be revoked by the assessor, the City Clerk or designee, upon failure to file and pay on time.

The ordinance adds new sections regarding filing amended returns, restricting use of sales tax return information and allocating partial tax payments.

Information required to be filed by the City would remain confidential and available for inspection only by employees and agents of the City to do their jobs, the person supplying the information, and persons authorized in writing by the person supplying the information.

The City would disclose the name and address of a person holding a current City sales tax license and whether a sales tax licensee is more than 30 days delinquent in filing and the number of returns not filed.

If adopted, the ordinance would limit penalty on overdue tax to 15 percent, but the interest on unpaid tax would go up to $15 percent Currently, the overdue return generates a penalty of 10 percent per month. Under the revision, $50 would be the penalty for late filing if no tax were Several took the podium to note that the ordinance did not revise the pull-tab tax.

"The issue is unfair taxation," Tim Smith said. "Pull tabs are taxed differently than other things in Nome."

Go down to Bonanza to buy $15 worth of fuel, give them $100 and you get $85 back The distributor gets

Go to a bar to buy pull-tabs, from a vendor, I get $85 worth of prizes, and vendor gets $15. On the 20th of the month, Bonanza sends in sales tax. They have gross sales of 15 dollars. They pay 75-cent sales tax. When the pull-tab permittee sends in sales tax on 20th, they've got sales of $100. They pay $5. Each person earns the same money; one pays $5 to the City the other pays 75 cents to the city. It's unfair taxation.

"What we're asking is a more fair tax rate," Smith said. "My hope for this meeting was that we could amend the sales tax ordinance," and add back a change in the method of taxing pull-tabs.

You take $200,000 out, you have to cut something out," Andersen commented. Smith said he had a proposal—for another discussion—to increase the tax base.

Mitch Erickson had another idea. "Right now raffles and other games of chance are exempt from sales tax. Pull-tabs are not. You could level the playing field," Erickson

"That group (raffle operators) is lot larger than your group," Andersen

"So, the wheels need to be greased a little bit harder, is that what you're saying?" Erickson asked An-

"Unlike other taxable sales in town, this one is the only one where you are mandated by the state to give prizes. You are mandated to give some of your profits away," Mark Johnson observed.

"If you need more money for the city, I think you should start taxing all these junk cars around the city, like on Sixth Avenue. It's a big eyesore. It's a pile of junk there," Erna Rasmussen said. "If you put a tax there, people would do something."

In other business: The council approved of a bid by PLS Construction, Jared Miller, sole owner, for a base amount of $91,000 squeaked by with Mayor Denise Michels breaking a tie vote. City Manager Josie Bahnke asked that the Council amend the resolution to reflect the additive alternative for $13,000 to make job total of $104,000 to provide sealant and joint interface between the siding and the trim on the bell tower. "Does that include paint, it doesn't say," said Andersen. He quizzed Bahnke on requirements included in the bid specifications.

"Staff put together a concrete list of specifications by the Council's request. We received one responsive bid," she said. "If the Council doesn't want to recommend the resolution, that's fine. I was recommending this resolution be approved. Thank you.'

"I see nothing about the windows. That's going to require another cost to this bid," Andersen said. "The architect recommended the storm windows be repaired. It's going to take a lot of work, so I see that as an extra cost down the road."

Andersen questioned bidder qualifications and quality assurance in bid document itself.

To me, if he has never done that work before, for $100,000 of tax payers money you would want to make sure he had done it all," Andersen said.

To me, $100,000 just to paint the outside of that building is too much. If we sleep on it this winter we could probably find a cheaper way.'

"Is there a reason—it is too late to paint this year—it couldn't wait until this spring," Councilwoman Mary Knodel suggested, asking to see if there are more bids out there.

The Council voted on the question without the amendment for $13,000 for steeple work. The vote: Andersen, Knodel and Josie Stiles, no; Louis Green Sr., Randy Pomeranz and Jerald Brown, yes. Michels broke the tie with a yes vote.

- Council unanimously voted to renew Bahnke's contract for one year at a salary of $110,000.
- · Passed a resolution of support for Pres. Barack Obama to effect the ratification of the UN Convention of The Law of The Sea. Without the ratification, the United States cannot take part in discussions to amend provisions of UNCLOS that relate to mineral resources in the Arctic ocean, essential scientific research, environmental protection, national security and other issues.
- · John Handeland thanked Nome Police Chief John Papasadora for getting the musk ox away from town. "Sunday morning I saw them closer to town than I've ever seen them before [above Dry Creek on west side near the Ingeborg Handeland and Ron Engstrom homes]," Handeland told the Council. He also thanked biologist Tony Gorn for explaining the ways of musk ox and the steps that state Dept. of Fish and Game had taken. The Council voiced an intention to ask Tony Gorn to visit schools to explain the dangers of musk ox. Over the weekend, children were observed throwing rocks at the animals near town. "I'm concerned, we've had animals injured by musk ox. It is only a matter of time before it is a human. At a minimum we need to get word out to parents and the public. A child with a rock is not as effective as law enforcement and biologists with training," Handeland said.

· Set compensation for election judges and chair at $10 an hour and $9.50 for clerks for the election board for the Oct. 2 municipal election. The Council appointed Donna Morgan as chair and Eleanor Oakes as Judge, with Francis Alvanna as inspector and clerks Evelyn Omiak, Shirley Tisdale and Lilly Rose.

• Mayor Michels appointed Doug Johnson to the Nome Port Commission to fill the seat left vacant by Cam Kristenson who moved to the Steinacher visited a Housing First project called 'San Marco' in Duluth, MN and a tribally-run project in Minneapolis named 'Anishinabe Wakiagun.' Residents at both projects are allowed to smoke and drink in their own room, but drinking and smoking is forbidden in the common areas and visitors may only be received in the common spaces. Meals are served cafeteria style and there are no cooking facilities in the rooms.

Housing First

"The premise is that one cannot begin to take even the most basic steps towards improving their personal circumstances while living on the street, and that homelessness only reinforces alcohol addiction," Steinacher explains. She argues that while some Housing First residents do eventually quit drinking, most don't, and they tend to drink less and shift from hard alcohol to beer. More importantly, their drinking is done in a safe environment, they tend to move off the streets, and the need for police intervention and ER visits drops dramatically. "You can't force people to quit drinking but you can reduce the harm it does to the individual and the community," Steinacher said.

Steinacher reported that the police in Minnesota had only praise for the Housing First projects. Although they were skeptics at first — after all, the project houses several chronic inebriates in one building and allows them to drink in their rooms — the police noticed that they don't get more calls to the Housing First project than to any other building with the same number of occupants. "More importantly, they no longer find themselves having to deal with the group of people they used to have to deal with on a daily basis, and have more time for the rest of their policing duties," said Steinacher.

After her trip, Steinacher said that she feels that the Housing First approach would help address some of Nome's most obvious problems with public drunkenness, and the cost to the police department, Anvil Mountain Correctional Center, the court system and the hospital ER, not to mention simply being humane. "Think of it as the smart way to do the right thing," she said.

Critics may argue that such a concept enables bad habits that the public ends up paying for.

"I was one of those people who initially was concerned that the NEST shelter would enable people to drink," admits Steinacher. "But then vou realize that not only are you saying lives and instilling dignity, but you're also reducing the stress and worry families experience when their loved ones are drinking," Steinacher argues.

In Nome, NEST has done its share of harm reduction to the individuals who are too drunk to care for their own well-being, as well as to the community. "NEST lessened the pressure on the police and eased the burden at the Emergency Room," Steinacher said. According to statistics from last winter - when NEST was open every night from November 15 through April 30 - the Nome Police Department saw a 33 percent drop in calls relating to a "drunk down" and saw a 32 percent drop in the number of people picked up on a protective, 12-hour custody hold. Statistics gleaned from hospital records reveal that there were 164 alcohol-related ER visits in 2010, and that those dropped to 122 visits in

A Housing First approach would go several steps further than NEST by offering not just overnight shelter space but permanent housing, a chance to stay safe and the prospect of finding help to overcome alcohol addiction, if the person is so inclined. It would also reduce the number of people sleeping and eating at the shelter nightly. Last winter the shelter housed 142 different people, but ten individuals filled most of the beds on most nights.

In order to get a Housing First project off the ground in Nome, it would be helpful to have a Nome housing coalition in place to sit at the table along with other key players. Other Alaska communities with the same problem have already created housing coalitions.

A Juneau Housing Coalition member joined with the Juneau city manager, a police department representative, Regional Housing Authority vice-president and Juneau Mental Health administrators on the trip to Minnesota, and is now beginning the process of planning for a Juneau Housing First project. Anchorage already implemented a Housing First project with the Karluk Manor. And Fairbanks' Tanana Chiefs have a Housing First project almost ready to

For Nome, it would take more than NEST to plan, fund and manage a Housing First project. A formalized housing coalition, Steinacher argues, would be a key player in bringing a Housing First project to Nome.

Seattle area. Johnson in his application said, "I am interested in the safe and successful operation of the Port of Nome. I have been in charge of the fuel transfer for Nome Joint Utility System for the past 10 years." Robert Hafner, a gold dredge operator who is current president of the Nome Chamber of Commerce and coach for youth hockey and softball, also applied for the seat.

· Council entertained an exchange between City staff and miner Mike Benchoff. Benchoff has satisfied two of three requirements to continue to use Port of Nome. He still needs to get liability insurance for his tugboat dredge Rustler per the port tariff law. Benchoff received notice that he must produce a certificate of insurance by Sept. 15 or face a $500 per day fine. Benchoff said he could not obtain insurance unless he lied to say his dredge was a pleasure craft, that insurance companies did not have a category for suction dredges. Harbormaster Jov Baker handed Benchoff copies of insurance certificates showing other dredges had been insured. She expressed reluctance at giving out private information, but said that the certificates were subject to public record laws. All vessels need to be out of the inner harbor by Oct. 31, according to Baker who quoted the Port of Nome tariff Tuesday morning.

• Finally, City Manager Tom Moran issued the oath of office to new Nome Police Dept. Officer Cary Barajas and Joseph Grubb, community service officer.

The State Dept. of Administration received another $5 million to analyze needs, design and construction costs. "These studies and analysis by DOA have determined it is in the best interest of the State and the most fiscally responsible option to preserve the existing Nome State Office Building through a major renovation," said Hultberg.

With existing funds and an additional $5 million, renovations would extend the existing building life by 30 years, Hultberg said.

Modifications would relocate the mechanical system from the crawl space to the roof to avoid damage from flooding, augmenting the seawall outside for added protection from water and replacement of the exterior wall assembly and restoring steel members' capacity.

After 37 years, Arctic Trading Post closes its doors

Nome Covenant Church acquires Madden house and Arctic Trading post to expand church

By Diana Haecker

On September 15 an era comes to an end, when the Arctic Trading Post is going to open its door for the last time to shoppers to buy gifts, artwork or to get the morning coffee or latte

The daily ritual to climb up the stairs of the Arctic Trading Post, get a coffee and talk story of what's going on in Nome will come to an end. It's something that won't be easily replaced.

The Arctic Trading Post property has sold to the Nome Covenant Church and come October 1, the building will be turned over to its new owners. The church envisioned to remodel the building and to transform it into a youth center.

The Knodel family, Mary and Howard with sons Chris and Pat, owned the gift shop since Sept. 5, 1975. Although it's been mostly Mary, who greeted customers every day behind the glass counter filled with jade letter openers, gold nugget jewelry and ivory carvings, she's quick to point out that the store is a family business. "People only see me behind the counter, but it's not just me. It's been Howard and the kids, they all helped me so much," Knodel

Memories

The Knodels arrived in Nome in 1970 when Howard Knodel was hired as a vocational education teacher to teach home building at the Nome school. Mary remembers the day they arrived in Nome, she in a dress, Howard in suit and tie, and the school's principal picked them up, dressed in muddy hip boots because it was just one of those muddy rainy days that Nome is known to have. "There was no housing, we had to share an apartment with two other couples for a few months," remembered Mary Knodel. While Howard Knodel taught carpentry, Mary went to work as secretary to the principal and then later as the secretary to the superintendent. After a few years, Dennis Corrington, then-owner of the Arctic Trading Post, offered Mary the job to manage the shop with the idea that the Knodels would buy it eventually. In 1975 the deal was made. Knodel remembered that the Trading Post consisted of two yak huts (buildings used by the Army as prisons), three Quonset huts and a state road camp all pushed together as one unit. In 1980, the Knodels build the existing blue building with the store downstairs and the living area upstairs. This, Mary said, enabled her to work and raise her two sons herself, instead of working away from home and having somebody else watch over her kids.

The Trading Post saw the fat years of the 1980s when 24,000 tourists came through town in the 100 days of summer. Knodel remembered that part of the Trading Post was a museum to showcase the Eskimo culture of the Bering Strait region with different artifacts from tool-making exhibits to fine art carvings. When the tourism boon died down, Knodel added merchandise and services to cater to the locals: books, picture framing and the flower business.

For a while, she also worked with Sears and took orders for Nomeites who came to peruse the Sears catalogs at the Trading Post. That part of the business came to an end when Sears got out of the catalog business.

Only later, about ten years ago, did the Arctic Trading Post start offering espresso, latte and fancy coffee drinks. This drew a steady stream of regulars every morning to the shop, and while there, meet with other Nomeites and talk story. It had the added bonus -for the customer at least - that Mary Knodel also happens to be a Nome Common Council member and for the past 12 years, she heard every day from constituents how the city should do this, that or the other.

Having spent most of her life at the Arctic Trading Post, raising her family and having built a successful business there, Knodel said — not without melancholy, "We had a great life here.'

She reminisced about those special times when year after year the same people come back to Nome and reunite. This happens during the Iditarod when returning fans come back to Nome and to the Arctic Trading Post. Or when returning miners from the GPAA camp came back year after year and trade news with Mary at the Trading Post. "It's always been like family reunions without the baggage," joked Mary.

Knodel said the store touched so many people's lives, when she thinks of all the kids who had their summer jobs working in the store, all the artists who came with their exquisite carvings to sell to the Arctic Trading Post, all the Nome painting artists who exhibited and sold their artwork at the store.

Was there an all time best seller that was sold at the Arctic Trading Post? Mary Knodel chuckled and said, yes. "I sold probably hundreds of thousands of these plastic paper weights with real gold flakes embedded on top," Knodel said. "Those things just flew off the counter.' When the lady who manufactured these paperweights in California died, the item was phased out of the Trading Post's inventory.

The decision to sell the Arctic Trading Post had been made a few years ago, but a sale was never finalized until the Nome Covenant Church bought the property this year including the store and the living area. The shop behind the store building, located on First Avenue, belongs to Knodel's son Pat and remains in his possession.

Covenant Church expands

The Covenant Church plans to start a faith-based youth center in the Arctic Trading Post. That, Knodel said, made sealing the deal a little easier, knowing that it would help Nome's kids.

Chairman of the Covenant Church board Lloyd Perrigo said that plans are not yet finalized how the youth center would look like or what programs it will offer and what its opening dates and times are.

He said pastor Harvey Fiskeaux had a vision of creating a youth center in Nome and he found support for his vision from the Samaritan's Purse International, a nondenominational evangelical Christian organization providing emergency relief in disaster areas and community development in impoverished villages, according to their website. The organization is headed up by Franklin Graham, son of TV Evangelist Billy Graham. Perrigo said that the organization finances a few projects in Alaska, and when they heard of Fiskeaux's vision, "it became clear that our vision and their vision aligned," Perrigo said. After being thoroughly vetted, the Nome Covenant Church was given the approval of Samaritan Purse's representative and the financing to buy the Trading Post as well as the private residence of Bob and Sherri Madden between the church property and the Arctic Trading Post was secure. Perrigo said the church plans to move the Madden's house to make room for a new church building. "At this point, the plan is to build a new church building," Perrigo said. The new building is in its initial planning stages and no floor plans or rough sketches have been finalized. Building of the new church is slated to begin in summer 2013. Perrigo said the next step is to remodel the Arctic Trading Post and turn it into a youth center that could open as early as November or December.

The goal with the youth center, he said, is not necessarily to provide a supervised "hang out" for youth, but to teach relationship skills and build lifeskills, all based on Christian faith principles.

This week, the shelves at the Arctic Trading Post are emptying out as Nomeites stream in to shop for early Christmas gifts and bid farewell to the Arctic Trading Post.

Do you know your medication's side effects?

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

I remember seeing a B.C. comic in which Johnny Hart gives this advice through one of his prehistoric sages: "Never take a medication that has more side effects than you have symptoms."

This advice has merit, especially given the ever-growing list of new medications and the endless advertising encouraging you to ask your doctor about this or that new drug.

Every medication has certain risks, or side effects, that must be weighed against the benefits of taking the drug. Acetaminophen (Tylenol), for example, may cause liver problems, but these effects are rare in otherwise healthy people. Therefore the benefits of taking acetaminophen for a common ailment like arthritis usually outweigh the risks in most peo-

Sometimes the risk of taking a medication outweighs the benefit. In 2004, the drug company Merck withdrew one of its most popular arthritis medications, rofecoxib (Vioxx), because the medication was found to increase the risk of heart attacks in long-term users.

Most of the time, the risk-benefit balance of a drug is not clearly tilted one way or the other. For example, the Food and Drug Administration is currently evaluating whether or not a diabetes drug called pioglitazone (Actos) increases a person's risk of bladder cancer. Pioglitazone helps lower the blood sugar in people with diabetes, but it may increase the risk of bladder cancer in long-term users. Conclusions are difficult because the numbers are small. Around 1,880 people must take pioglitazone (Actos) for over a year to increase the risk of cancer for just one person.

But uncontrolled diabetes is associated with a 40 percent increased risk of bladder cancer. This means, (prepare yourself for this next sentence) patients must weigh the risk of getting bladder cancer from taking a drug that may actually lower the risk of bladder cancer by controlling the diabetes that increases the risk of bladder cancer. Even doctors get intellectual vertigo from dilemmas like

Sometimes the risk-benefit balance is more straightforward. The American Heart Association has stated that the benefit of taking a daily aspirin to reduce the risk of a heart attack is worth the risk of gas-does not have to be complicated. In the past, researching a medication took hours in a library. Now the Internet provides an amazing amount of easily accessed information regarding medications and their side effects. One of my favorite sites is medlineplus.gov. It provides non-propriinformation etary collected by trusted sources like the Mayo Clinic, the American Academy of Family Medicine, and the National Institutes of Health.

It is also important to check for adverse drug interactions when you are prescribed more than one medication at a time or if you take overthe-counter medications. Again, the Internet provides several sites that help you compare the possible effects of interactions between various medications. Your doctor or local pharmacist can also review your medication list for any possible adverse interactions.

Reading about your medications and their side effects will no doubt lead to many questions. Your doctor can help you sift through this information and weigh the benefits and risks of taking certain drugs. Learning about your medications takes time; but remember that your health is an investment. Just like any investment, you must ensure the benefits outweigh the risk.

NOME NANOOKS RUNNERS - Runners from the Nome-Beltz Nanooks Varsity and Junior Varsity squad traveled to Kotzebue last weekend for a XC meet. The Nome boys and girls varsity teams won individual as well as overall team titles.

Nome cross-country team continues early season success in Kotzebue

By Stephen Palmatier

Last weekend, the Nome-Beltz Nanooks cross-country team continued what has been so far a great start to the season, winning both meets they have participated in.

The Nanooks traveled to Kotzebue last weekend, but the unfamiliar territory did not seem to faze them

The girls' race started off the day of competition and Nome excelled, finishing in the top three positions in the race. The top three spots put a wrap on winning the meet, continuing their winning ways where they left off two weeks ago in Nome.

Finishing in those top three places were Rosa Schmidt in first, Senora Ahmasuk in second and Hannah Tozier in third position. Tozier, who did not run in the Nome meet two weeks ago, makes this ladies squad stronger now that she is back run-

The boys' race took off right after the girls' race and it was more of the same for the Nanooks.

The boys also came away with a victory, defeating Kotzebue in total points scoring 23 compared to Kotzebue's 32. The Nanooks finished with the top finisher in Tim Schmidt, who won in Nome as well, and with the fourth through seventh positions. Finishing in fourth was Leif Erickson, his brother Junyor Erickson coming in fifth place, James Horner and Nick Morgan finished in the sixth and seventh places.

The Nome cross-country team looked even stronger last weekend with the surprise finish of James Jorgensen who came in eighth place in the boys race. Jorgensen's finish was a breakout performance having started the season as the number four-ranked iunior varsity runner.

If the Nanooks continue to run like they have shown thus far, there is no saying how far they could go in region and state.

Our runners are helping each other and setting great examples," said Jeff Collins, head coach of the Nanooks cross-country team. "I think our team has a bright future ahead of them."

The Nome Nanooks will now put their undefeated streak on the line when they head down to the Bethel to compete on Sept. 14 and the Su-Valley XC meet on Sept. 15.

Nome volleyball team continues early season success

By Stephen Palmatier

The Nome Lady Nanooks volleyball team remained victorious as they made a strong opening statement in Nome last weekend, defeating the Kotzebue Lady Huskies once again.

As was the case two weeks ago to kick off the volleyball season in Kotzebue, the Nome ladies were no match for the Huskies, as the Lady Nanooks dominated them in every facet of the game, winning the first match 25-11, 25-14, and 25-13. In the second game, it was more of the same with Nome winning 25-10, 25-11 and 25-15.

"I think we played really good as a team," said Devynn Johnson, one of four seniors of the squad, who had nine kills total over the weekend. "We had great communication and we are continuing to grow every match," said Johnson.

Junior Ariana Horner led the team over the weekend with 10 kills and four stuff blocks, and senior Taylor Pomeranz had 8 kills.

The Lady Nanooks were so dominating that every player on the team had at least one kill over the weekend. The height of the Lady

Nanooks, in particular with Devynn Johnson, Horner and Pomeranz was simply overwhelming to the shorter players of the Kotzebue squad.

Perhaps the best quality of the team over the weekend though was their serving. The Lady Nanooks had 21 services aces over the weekend, making many points quick and easy.

Even with the comfortable wins over the weekend against the Huskies, there were certainly some things to keep an eye on down the road for potential trouble for the Nanooks. In both matches, the Lady Nanooks got off to hot starts but as the match progressed did not play as effectively as a team.

"We too often last year played down to our competition," said Johnson explaining the troubles of their later sets. "We are trying to overcome that problem as a team, and so far we are getting better at it, but still have a long way to go," said John-

Problems like these can be common with a team still trying to find its footing early in a season. In general, the Nome Lady Nanooks looked strong and seemed to get a boost playing in front of their home fans again. For head coach Lucas Frost, coaching in his first home game for the Lady Nanooks, he was not in as much ease on the sideline as his ladies seemed to look while playing on the court.

Frost admitted to feeling sick to the stomach due to nervousness. "I was probably more nervous than all of my players," said Frost. The Nome Junior Varsity squad also performed well, winning both their matches in straight sets. They won 25-11, 25-18, and 25-21 in the first match and 25-15, 25-14, and 25-15 in the second. With the Nome ladies off to a good start at 4-0 in the season, they look to keep their confidence up and correct the few mistakes of the last weekend when they will play once again at home this coming weekend against Bethel. The first game this coming Friday will be a blue-out day and fans wearing Nome blue clothing will get some money off of their ticket admission. This is just one way to get more people to support the Nanook's volleyball team.

"I would love to see more people come out to support these ladies, especially considering we are a competitive team. When I was coaching in Kotzebue last year, they would fill up the gym, so I hope for the same this year here in Nome also," said

Nome will host Bethel JV and Varsity on Sept. 14-16.

EARLY MORNING AT THE HARBOR — Gold mining dredges are harbored along the Snake River entrance on September 10.

With improving weather, the number of dredges seen out in the water in front of Nome increased dramatically over the weekend and into the first part of the week. Calm seas, blue skies and chilly temperatures have replaced the stormy and rainy weeks of August and early September.

Port of Nome harbormaster Joy Baker reports in her weekly roundup of port activities that the port and harbor areas are still bustling with activities as fuel deliveries are made, gravel exported, gold dredges going to work off East and West Beach and the fishing fleet continues to harvest halibut out of Norton Sound.

Over the past week, Crowley had a mainline fuel delivery with one village barge lightering the product to the harbor. Vitus Marine delivered fuel via the tanker Moor with two lighter vessels in Nome to assist. Three gravel barges arrived to export gravel out of Nome and one mainline cargo barge, the Northland Services barge, arrived with goods for Nome and the region. Eight village landing crafts came in and out of Nome and several research boats are anchored outside the port. The South Korean research vessel and icebreaker Araon anchored in front of Nome on Monday. The Canadian icebreaker Polar Prince has been on the horizon while anchored five miles out to sea. The research boat Bristol Explorer and support vessel Arctic Seal left Nome for a surface trawl survey in the Northern Bering and Northern Chukchi Seas. The survey is part of the first comprehensive oceanographic and fisheries survey by a team of scientists from federal and state agencies and the University of Alaska at Fairbanks. The study is funded by the Dept. of Interior's Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, the State of Alaska coastal impact assistance program and NOAA. It's purpose is to gather scientific information to avoid or mitigate effects of future offshore oil and gas developments on arctic marine life.

Four recreational sailboats are currently in the harbor. The sailing vessel Roxane arrived last week with French sailor Luc Dupont, who sailed the Northwest Passage solo. The other sailboats are pleasure vessels Teleport, Philos and Anna. The Teleport and Roxane are planning to overwinter in Nome, whereas Philos and Anna are slated to leave on Monday for warmer waters. The Polar Bound, piloted by 70-year old solo sailor David Scott Cowper of Newcastle, England, arrived on Friday and departed on Sunday.

4-H returns to Nome

By Clara Hansen

It has been many years since Nome has had a 4-H club. In September of 2011, a new group of 4-H'ers formed under the name Golden Clovers. The club was headed up by leaders Tim and Stacie Motis with the help of Extension Agent Kari van Delden, parents Mike and Shoni Evans and Angela Hansen. At the monthly meetings, the members learned parliamentary procedure and club officers were elected as follows: President is Anna Marie Motis; Vice President is Heather Evans; Secretary is Catherine Ojanen; News Reporter is Clara Hansen; Recreation leaders are Noah Hobbs, Dustin Evans and Gareth Hansen; Sergeants-at-Arms are Cody Evans and Aaron Motis. The club took on two different projects. The girls chose cooking and the boys selected aviation. The girls learned how to make jam, quick breads, fondant and yeast breads as well as learning the nutritional value of local berries and whole grains in baking. They also decorated cookies with royal icing and made popcorn and bread sculptures.

The boys learned about aviation careers, parts of a plane and the phonetic alphabet. They built rockets, studied weather and clouds and took tours of a Coast Guard helicopter and other aircraft. In addition, they visited the air control tower and weather station.

Obituaries

Ella Tanner

Ella Tanner, 97, passed away in Nome on August 5, 2012 at home.

Ella Tanner

Ella was born at Candle, Alaska on May 24, 1915 to Robert and Susie Snyder. She lived on the bank of the Kiwalik River for part of the year with her family and would take a raft to Candle to live there during the other half of the year. The Snyder residence on the Kiwalik River, also known on vintage maps as "Snyder's Roadhouse," was known to many travelers as a safe place to stay for the night, so the family often had visitors in their one-room cabin which was partially insulated with sod. Ella's siblings were Tacoma, Roy, Florence, Dolly and Martha.

In 1924, the Snyder family packed up their belongings and moved to Nome by dog team where Robert Snyder made a living freighting goods by dog team. The family lived on Carsten's Way, which at the time was at the edge of town. Since there was no water system, her "papa" would take their dog team toward Gold Hill to fetch water from a spring that was available all winter. Ella talked about how as children, she and her sister would visit the horses in a nearby stable and also make their way across town to the Snake River dock where they could buy candy at the best prices.

Ella graduated in 1933 at the Nome School as Salutatorian. At the time there were only a few Alaska Native students attending the public school. Although there were many social prejudices in Nome, Ella overcame them with dignity. In 1939, Ella married C.C. Tanner, who was Nome's U.S. Commissioner and ex-officio Judge. They had one daughter, Carol.

Ella worked for many years in the business office field. She retired from the Bureau of Indian Affairs Nome office in 1985. She was a helpful and generous person and always a good listener. Most everyone called her "Gram." She had many friends and was highly respected by everyone who knew her.

Ella is survived by her daughter, Carol Olsen (Victor); grandchildren: Debbie Parsons (Tony), Jay Wieler (Lucinda), Dawn Salesky (Jim Adams), and Janice Doherty (Doug); great-grandchildren: Iris Wieler, Chrystiene Salesky, Derek Wieler, Erica Wieler, Landon Wieler and Alex Westlake; nieces and nephews: Roberta Reyes, Kris Johnson, Roy Snyder, Jr., and Ed Larson.

She was predeceased by her parents, Robert and Susie Snyder; siblings: Tacoma King, Roy Snyder, Sr., Florence Snyder, Dolly Gerberg, Martha Larson; nieces and nephew: Corinne Snyder, Loretta Helle and Chuck Snyder.

Ella was very grateful to the staff at NSHC for all their support, and for all her family and friends that visited and helped her this year. At her request, no services were planned.

Saying It Sincerely

By Rev. Julie Yoder Elmore, Community United Methodist Church A member of the Nome Ministerial Association

> Hope in the Midst of Despair Scripture Focus – Philippians 1:21-30

As a community and region, we have experienced the loss of some amazing people and have endured other hardships. Over the last year alone, I presided over eight funerals and attended several more that my colleague did. That's a lot of grief and pain for a community and yet, it is our faith in God that carries us through these difficult times and makes us stronger in the process. Even when tomorrow does not look hopeful and we wonder how we are going to make it, God's comfort and strength is there. God's comfort and strength comes through prayer and reading our Bible, as well as in unexpected places and people. It is like God cradling us in God's arms or holding us in the palm of God's hand.

The Apostle Paul knew what it was like to be in a state of hopelessness. He was in prison when he wrote the letter to the Philippians. He was conflicted about whether or not to rejoice if he died or rejoice if he was released. His faith was strong and his mission was clear. If he died for spreading the Gospel, then he knew that he would be with God and it would be a time of celebration. If he was released from prison, this meant that he could continue to share the Gospel and encourage the people in the churches he had started. His faith in God and God's purposes is an example we can follow, especially when we are feeling discouraged.

As Paul writes from jail, a place of despair, he finds hope. The members of the church at Philippi are standing in one spirit and mind, working together because of their faith of the gospel. Their faith is strong and he encourages them not to be intimidated by those who would oppose and persecute them. He encourages them that it is a privilege to believe in Christ and to suffer for Christ as well. Even through the struggles they face as followers of Christ, there is still hope that Christ is victorious over evil.

How might you be experiencing hopelessness today? If you are not experiencing hopelessness, who around you might be experiencing a loss of hope? For some, the increase in darkness in our days can bring a sense of hopelessness. For others, it is the anniversary of the death of a loved one. For others still, it may be the loss of a job or dream. How is God calling you to be a beacon of God's light to others experiencing hopeless times? We all experience up and down times and as a community, we are called to lift one another up with the assurance that there is more to this life than meets the eye. Our ultimate hope is in God who makes all things possible.

and several others don't like to hear what we have to say about the direction they have taken with our regions CDO money.

On the other hand, I'd like to take this opportunity to thank several other brave people in our community. Thank you to Vince Pikonganna for standing up and speaking out. He truly knows what it means to be an American. Thanks also to Leo and Terry for their letters. I admit that it is scary to stand up and speak out against people who are going out of their way to criminalize innocent people just for speaking up. Thank you for your voices.

We want more salmon for people to harvest. That's always been the drive behind the Nome Fishermen's Association. What we want isn't criminal. I think the people would stand up and agree if it weren't for the bullying and the unethical efforts taken to silence us.

Sincerely Rita Smith. Secretary/Treasurer, NFA Nome, Alaska 99762

To the editor.

Dan Harrelson's letter in the September 6, 2012 Nome Nugget and the letters leading up to it are a reminder that history repeats itself.

On March 3, 1944, Alberta Schenck Adams published the following in a letter to the Nome Nugget.

"It has been known and said through centuries that all American citizens have the right to go, do, and say what they please."

What has hurt us constantly is that we are not able to go to a public theater and sit where we wish, but yet we pay the SAME price as anyone else and our money is GLADLY received. We are not allowed even to go to public doings, only when money is concerned for the benefit of the so-called society people of our

"These human beings who think they are in a higher standard than others admit they are citizens of America, but the majority are not loyal to what is written in the Constitution.'

An anonymous letter to the editor appeared in a following paper with this defense of the movie theater's longstanding policy. "It would be hard for management to change their present system even though some of the Natives themselves do not like to sit next to "odoriferous" persons."

On a spring day in 1944, Alberta went to see a movie at the Dream Theater in downtown Nome and sat down in the last empty seat which happened to be in the wrong section of the theater. The Nome Chief of Police arrested her and hauled her off

We've come a long way. Sixtyeight years later, my wife Rita and I went to a public meeting of an NSEDC committee held in the Bering Straits Native Corporation boardroom. I took one of the few empty seats in the wrong section and the Nome police were called upon to remove me. The current Nome Chief of Police told me that I would be arrested if I went to any more NSEDC meetings regardless of which section

I didn't think I was all that odoriferous. And contrary to what Dan says in his letter, I was not, "disruptive, abusive, or have trouble adhering to normal meeting protocol." That's a lie. You can listen to an audio recording of the meeting on YouTube and judge for yourself at: http://youtu.be/dDETOB8DgZg

Back to 1944. Alberta Schenck Adams wasn't about to settle for second class citizenship. A week after she got out of jail, she went back to the Dream Theater and got arrested again. This time her father paid her fine on the spot to keep her out of rehensible way she had been treated. Gruening angrily demanded an explanation from the Nome mayor and promised legislation to address discrimination in Alaska. On February 16, 1945, he signed the first comprehensive civil rights law passed anywhere in America.

Harrelson's notion that Congress intended that Norton Sound's CDO program would be a privately owned, tax exempt, secret society for 15 people, gifted with a goose that lays golden eggs worth $164 million and growing is ludicrous if you think about it for a moment. What legislative body would do that? There is nothing private about NSEDC.

Dan's right that the laws requiring transparency and accountability are inadequate. The CDQ groups spent a big pile of our money on lobbyists in 2006 to make it that way. But what congress can dismantle, congress can repair and we should be doing our best to let them know that they have some more lawmaking to do. Arrogant letters like Dan's help a lot.

The State of Alaska needs to wake up and take an active role too. The first thing that they need to do is require that CDQ groups adhere to the requirements of the Alaska Open Meetings Act and the Alaska Public Records Act. Dan helpfully pointed out that they don't have to do that now and that's a serious deficiency.

The state is conducting a decennial review of the CDQ groups this year and an objective review will reveal the need for more oversight and more checks and balances. Hard times are coming for the bush and Ted Stevens is no longer there to fix our screw-ups. We need to make sure that we don't waste this opportunity iust because Dan likes things the way they are. Dreams are great but eventually you have to wake up.

Oh, remember that longstanding official policy Janis Ivanoff wrote about that prohibited recording at an NSEDC meeting? They are still having a little trouble finding it.

Janis said, "As a practice, NSEDC does not allow unauthorized recording devices to be used at its meetings."

I faxed a request to their Anchorage lawyer Howard Trickey for a copy of that policy but haven't heard back from him yet.

When questioned by the Nome Police Department about NSEDC's longstanding no-recording policy, Kyan Olanna said, "It's not a written policy.'

So what other kinds of official policies are there?

Youth programs eye NSEDC community funds

By Sandra L. Medearis

Some good ideas are afoot for spending $200,000, a part of the annual Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation's community share money coming to member villages that are beneficiaries of money earned from the region's cut of Bering Sea fisheries.

According to NSEDC rules, the Nome Common Council decides on one or more projects following input from the public for an enhanced lifestyle in the Nome area. This year, the available sum includes $100,000 earmarked for youth programs.

When a community meeting produced similar proposals for youth services projects, the Council asked proposers to get together over the drawing board to see where they could coordinate overlapping ideas before the final hearing and decision at the Council meeting Sept. 24. NSEDC needs to have the City's decision by Sept. 28.

As presented, here is a sampling of ideas: Nome Community Center needs funding for Boys and Girls Club as the fostering agency has run short of money and cut the budget. The program serves youth from first grade through middle school, according to David Elmore, NCC executive director. He wants to keep the connection with Boys and Girls Club of America going as they provide programming curriculum expertise in terms of essential life skills—making smart choices, resisting peer pressure, resisting drinking and putting off premature sexual activity.

"It's really a significant resource to partner with Boys and Girls Club of America even though they don't have the money that they used to bring to the table with them," Elmore told the Council.

NCC also proposed a program to transport youngsters to the swimming pool for lessons.

Councilman Stan pointed out that the Nome Public Schools had a similar swimming proposal.

"I would certainly be happy to partner with any of the organizations in town that have programs to help our youth." Elmore declared.

Earlier in the meeting, Kirsten Bey, high school swim team coach, proposed funding for pool improve-

Wien Building goes back on abatement list

By Sandra L. Medearis

It's a tattered one-time white elephant sitting on Front Street that no one wants in any way but gone.

No-wait a minute. Mark Sackett was willing to cut a deal with owner Pat Hahn in August for a dollar and walk away the new owner. A town's eyesore became a visionary's treas-

Sackett sees a different Wien Building, not ramshackle, but with new siding and nice efficiency apartments within its hulk. Sackett's plan shared Monday is to move the twostory eyesore a block eastward down Front Street to begin a new life behind his Mark's Soap-n- Suds barlaundromat business

Allen Maxwell, City of Nome's building inspector, reported that after inspection, he didn't think the build ing could be moved when the subject of abatement came up at the last

Nome Common Council meeting.

The subfloor was rotted out of the building, he told the Council. Sections of the building were rotten.

Councilwoman Mary Knodel noted that Sackett hadn't gotten back with a written plan for the building, therefore, it should move back to the abatement list.

The building has resided on the City's abatement list of derelicts for several years, needing to be moved, renovated or torn down.

The land belongs to the Boucher family. The building belonged to Pat Hahn until he unloaded it. First, Hahn had to take off asbestos siding that made the building a public nuisance and put it on the abatement list, according to City Manager Josie Bahnke. Hahn went up and down a ladder removing the hazardous ma

Wellness Center concept stresses regional culture to heal

By Diana Haecker

The need for a regional drug and alcohol treatment center has been apparent in Nome ever since the last treatment center closed its doors over a decade ago. Public drunkenness, the prevalence of alcohol-induced domestic violence, assaults, suicides and even unintentional accidents are symptoms of a disease that need to be addressed.

On the Web:

Regional approach

After two and a half years of researching Nome's and the region's visions for a drug and alcohol abuse center, Norton Sound Health Corporation's Behavioral Health Services arrived at a point, where a concept is fleshed out.

BHS acting director Lance Johnson stressed that the input of the region was crucial in coming up with the current concept. "We can sit here and design a skyscraper, when really the people want something entirely different," Johnson said. Listening to what is wanted, BHS came up with a concept of a substance and alcohol treatment center that is rooted in the regional culture and tradition. The Wellness Center, as it is called, is in its pre-development stages and would be potentially housed in the old Norton Sound Regional Hospital once current hospital staff and offices moved into the new hospital on Greg Kruschek Avenue.

The real novelty to the approach is its vision to "refill the cup" and replace negative habits like drinking or drug abuse with positive, culturally relevant and traditional activities that center on being whole and healthy. A residential treatment facility in Nome was terminated around the year 2000 and patients were sent out of the region for treatment. "This needs to stop," Jay David, BHS clinician and counselor said. In an interview with The Nome Nugget, David metaphorically pointed to his gigantic water cup. "Those programs are great at emptying out the cup, but you have to refill it," David said. He said if you leave a void, it's all too easy to fill the cup back up with alcohol or whatever addiction somebody craves. The Wellness Center plans to offer traditional and cultural activities to meaningfully fill the void left by drugs or alcohol by taking patients to Nuuk for subsistence fishing, berry picking or greens gathering. Or by preparing subsistence foods together. Or sewing skins or story telling. BHS counselors already practice this every Friday, taking clients out to Nuuk. "Good treatment is not taking away something, but making an exchange," David explained. "We want to fill the person up with the good." Myra Murphy, the Wellness Center planner also explains that a Cultural Committee steers the decisions made on what is culturally appropriate in terms of activities and facility design, even whether or not communal shower rooms in the lady's or men's section would be culturally acceptable.

The components

The Wellness Center, Murphy explained, would be made up of several components.. It won't be a residential treatment facility, but the Center would offer several levels of programs. Jay David said that clients' needs are assessed and a treatment plan would be tailored to the needs of each person seeking help.

One segment of the Wellness Center is the sobering center. It would function as a sleep-off facility with Emergency Medical Technicians available for care for people who need a few hours in a safe place. The

Letters

Letter to the editor,

My wife and I would like to express our extreme pleasure in the fact that our children, both in high school and the elementary, are seeing their principals and assistant principals in their classes. Our high school children in particular have been talking about how engaged and task oriented their classes have been compared to similar classes in previous years. When they come home in the evening it is nice to listen and see the excitement on their faces as they tell the family about the projects and activities that they are doing in class. In addition, the stories usually end with the statement that principal Hanley or assistant principal Bushey was also in one or more of their classes on a given day.

We truly believe that there is a direct correlation between administration frequenting the classroom and positive classroom interaction and increased classroom focus and on task time. The principals are supervisors and therefore should be generally aware of what is going on in each teacher's classroom. The only way to do this is by going in the classroom. Principals in the classroom creates and/or maintains an environment of learning and gives opportunity for them to give their teachers valid and sincere suggestions, when they need to be given.

Also, having administrators in the classroom gives them an opportunity to create a history for understanding student behaviors. They are able to see students at various times with various teachers and develop ways to better engage students who are having difficulties both behaviorally and academically. Seeing the same students in various classes gives them a chance to understand why a student is getting along well in one class, but may not be getting along so well in another. They can use their knowledge of being in the classroom to see first hand what is working with the student. They can then pass that valued information on to other teachers. This in-turn has the potential to drastically change the education of our students in a very positive way.

In closing, I am very pleased with the new administration and their commitment to visit classrooms on a regular basis. I can only hope that this activity continues. It is understood that principals have a very busy schedule and getting into classroom can become a very difficult task if not seen as a priority.

Therefore, I want to extend my sincere thanks to our school, both teachers and administrators for making this a priority. We, for one, are hearing the near gold effects of administrators going into classrooms and what it has done to the caliber of education that all of our students are receiving from the Nome Public Schools.

Thank you. Sincerely, Corey Erikson P.O. Box 1312 Nome, AK 99762

Dear Editor,

Mail helps power the economic engine of the nation. It is a $900 billion industry that employees 8 million Americans.

For 237 years, the United States

Postal Service has provided dependable service at an affordable price. Postal Service products and services create jobs, strengthen relationships and connect businesses.

The Postal Service has updated its business plan for returning to longterm financial stability. While fundamentally consistent with the approach advanced by the Postal Service over the past year, the plan incorporates important refinements of financial projections and recommended legislative reforms.

At its core, the plan requires the reduction of annual costs by at least $20 billion by 2015, rising to more than $22 billion by 2016. This cost reduction is necessary given projected declines in First-Class volume, which has already dropped by 25% since 2006. However, the Postal Service can achieve only a portion of these reductions under current business model constraints; legislative changes are needed to achieve the full $20 billion in cost reductions.

In the absence of legislative reform that quickly enables meaningful operational changes and cost reductions, the Postal Service could incur annual losses as great as $18.2 billion by 2015 and accumulate a total debt of $92 billion by 2016.

The comprehensive five-year plan provides an achievable roadmap for long-term financial stability to preserve affordable mail service for the American public. The plan requires a combination of aggressive cost reduction, rethinking the way we manage our healthcare costs, and comprehensive legislation to reform the Post Service business model; Requires reduction of annual costs by at least $20 billion by 2015, rising to more than $22 billion by 2016; Aggressively pursues realignment of Job Security: Where's the Oversight? The Nome-Council Highway deep road cuts at Hastings were a bone of contention back in the 1980s when the new road was being rerouted. Old timers just shook their heads and wondered why intelligent engineers would dig a deep road cut when everyone knew it would just fill in with snow and be closed for the winter. Nomeites in the know said that it didn't take a genius to realize that the roadbed should be built up so that winds that blew across the tundra would keep the road free of snow.

Now, close to 30 years later the Alaska Department of Transportation is going to re-do the road and get rid of the deep cuts

Common sense eventually overcame bureaucratic inflexibility, but we spent a lot of money being wrong. This begs the question, "Where is the oversight?" We spend a lot of money planning, we do the wrong thing and then we have to spend more money to get things right. Maybe it's job security.

A Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

The Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum continues the look back at the 1900 Nome Gold Rush with more perspective from Wilfred A. Mc-Daniel Sr. We present excerpts from "Alaska Beckons" written by Wilfred in 1943. His love of Nome is quite evident in that his experiences in this exquisite land are still fresh in his mind forty-three years later. Last week Wilfred gave us his eye witness account of the first day of the September 1900 storm. This week the treacherous storm continues for a second day ...

Alaska beckons By Wilfred A. McDaniel Sr.

September 10, 1900

Daylight found us still struggling to save our badly scattered possessions and sleep was forgotten. Fortunately the sea had reached its highest point, and the barricaded tent had withstood the efforts of wind and seemed to increase in fury, however, the tide had turned and further danger was past.

During the night a large lighter, which had broken its moorings in the roadstead at Nome, lay grounded on the beach, close by, the breakers dashing over it. Some distance toward Nome, the dim outlines of a ship could be seen, piled high on the beach, it's masts tilted far over. Wreckage of all kinds was scattered about along the shore or floating in the sea. During the following days many cases of canned goods and great quantities of lumber were salvaged by the miners, carried for miles along the shore before the gale.

Between midnight of the previous day and noon, September 10th, the gale reached its climax, the wind then decreased, the sea became calmer and the danger from high water passed as the gale blew itself out. Within the five miles between our camp and Nome, three vessels lay broadside to the sea, stranded high on the sand, though little damaged! Several tug-boats and launches, some badly battered and keel up, hopelessly wrecked, were lying on the shore. Bodies of the unfortunates, unable to reach land were later washed ashore many miles from where disaster overtook them. The newly built settlement Nome was a sorry sight! The long,

River had been chosen by many as an ideal campsite and hundreds of tents had stood on its smooth, dry lands. It has been swept clean by the sea which had gone entirely over the lower portion of it, and high on the spit, formerly occupied by the camps, lay the shattered hull of a large ship, the Catherine Sutton, broken completely in two, a mass of wreckage!

Buildings close to the water's edge, behind the Sandspit, were in ruins. During the previous storms the Sandspit had been a protection, for here the sea spent its force, the waves breaking harmlessly on its sandy beaches. During the high tide and fierce gale of September 10th, it offered little obstruction to the terrific seas, which swept over it, spending their fury on the flimsy, closely built buildings beyond. The lower portion of Front Street was a jumbled mass of wreckage from buildings and furnishings, together with small boats if all kinds, piled in tangled heaps along the edge of the town, making an incongruous picture!

At the beginning of the storm several steamers were anchored in the roadstead, but these hastily raised anchor and retreated to the shelter of Sledge Island, some twenty miles distant, there to weather out the storm under the leeward side of it's meager shelter. The Skookum, an immense sea-going barge, brought from Seattle by a tow-boat, and loaded with a cargo of lumber, was a complete loss, her thousands of feet of lumber scattered broadcast by the sea for a distance of twenty miles or more. Lumber from the Skookum provided a source of supply for the miners and Eskimos for months, as the tides and currents along the Nome coast eventually cast ashore all floating debris.

On the evening of the 9th, which marked the beginning of the gale, a neighboring miner had asked permission to leave a fine dog, which he had just obtained, in a small storage tent, which he had placed near-by. In the excitement of saving our camp and outfit we had failed to notice that the sea had swept it from the beach! The tragic fate of the dog was never solved, for he was never seen again!

To be continued in the next edition of The Nome Nugget.

ments for the school swimming programs. Bey asked on behalf of the high school swim team and the club swim team for $5,000 for new lane lines that could also be used by community lap swimmers. The cost of the lane lines is a couple thousand dollars and the shipping is about

"The lane lines that the pool has now are quite old. They break frequently and are getting harder and harder to repair," Bey said Monday. 'They eventually get too short to repair. We're getting there with a couple of them. There are five lane lines; the pool can be divided into six

Mitch Erickson of Nome Youth Hockey Association, a group of volunteers formed in 2002, asked for $50,000 seed money as matching for grants they would seek from organizations such as the Rasmuson Foundation with which they had already had dialogue.

The project? A multipurpose facility for many activities-youth hockey, skating team, curling, running track around the edge-and summer activities—youth softball, for example.

"I don't know whether I've been colder at youth softball or coaching hockey," he said. "We had to call games this summer. The smaller kids could get out of the nasty weather."

Then Erickson went down on bended knee.

"I can be a beggar," he told the Council.

Next up came Tara Schmidt of Nome Community Center and Naomi Brunett of Nome Eskimo Community.

Their project? To combine re-camps operated in the past by NCC Tobacco Free Camp, NEC Culture and Norton Sound Health Corp. CAMP program, all concerning healthy living and learning traditional activities that lead to wellbeing and health. Attendance has been dwindling and resources with which to operate the camps, Schmidt said. Only NCC Tobacco Free Camp operated the past summer.

The programs want to operate two summer camps for 40 youth each session. Realization of the plan needs $46,000, but with $21,000 of available in-kind contribution, the request from the NSEDC funds is

Nome Public Schools Supt. Mike Brawner asked the Council for money to provide transportation and pool costs for swimming lessons for all 700 or so students in the school system. Youths who already know how to swim could partake of more advanced swimming activities, he

Additionally, Brawner spoke of providing after school instruction in sewing, cooking, traditional and other skills coordinating with NACTEC skill center.

'We have some very skilled people in the community who we would be excited to work with. We want to be able to pay reasonable stipends to people to teach these skills," Brawner told the Council.

The schools already have the structure and organization in place for an expanded program with Richard Beneville at the Nome Elementary School, Brawner said. He assured the Council he would work with any other programs to make enhanced youth programs a reality.

"These are not kids necessarily that are part of a volleyball team or a basketball team. What we want to do is to provide something for all kids, for everybody to have the opportunity to be involved in these programs," Brawner said.

'I especially like the part about learning cooking and sewing," Andersen said. "Over the past two generations or so, we haven't got that."

James Ventris wants to build a shop program for youth. He is with Covenant Youth of Alaska, a nonprofit organization associated with but independent of the Covenant Church, he said. The organization covers Norton Sound and Yukon-Kuskokwim Delta areas. Ventris, whose wife teaches at Nome-Beltz Jr.-Sr. High School, has resided in Nome for a year. The organization operates the Bible camp in Unalakleet. As regional program director for Norton Sound he puts together activities for the region's villages.

Ventris has built a multi-use shop the size of the Council Chambers for projects particularly aimed for young adult men next to his house, he said.

However, "my wife and I desire the program to grow to mentor both genders," Ventris said. "The project is that there would be different activities some large scale-I want to build some boats with young men for subsistence activities-to build mentoring around the activities like basket sleds. There would be midlevel projects like snowshoes. There would be smaller projects like ulus or seal oil lamps, anything that would float a kids boat and keep them interested and involved.

"Young people need mentoring. They need mentors in their lives," he

Ventris has been talking already with David Elmore of NCC and would be happy to coordinate with other groups to provide youth services, he said. He would especially like elders from XYZ Senior Center to come to the shop to share knowl-

He has donors from the Lower 48 for equipment and supplies, but has other needs like food and hospitality, $10,000 and $5,000 for elders' stipends, after which he would work with donors further.

"People are behind this project, the shop is built and the materials are on the way. If I could feed kids and pay elders, that would be excellent," Ventris concluded.

Barb Nickels spoke on behalf of the Nome Chamber of Commerce and its 72 members to present a downtown revitalization and beautification project. The C of C will be renewing a contract to manage the Nome Visitors Center. They want to build on the uniqueness of the community in three phases, enhance the charm of downtown, increase tourism, increase economic viability and bring shoppers back downtown, Nickels said. They are asking for $35,000 that could be used to leverage state and federal grants they would be seeking.

It would be a five-year marketing plan and three year plan for revital-

"The planning for Front Street improvements would be done by a committee of Front Street business owners," Nickels said Monday.

Nickels said a survey of businesses on what they needed yielded the following: increased tourism, downtown upgrades, facility improvements and more conventions and meetings in Nome. Sixty-seven percent of respondents said they were not satisfied with the cleanliness of downtown, Nickels said

"A healthy and vibrant downtown boosts the economic health and quality of life in the community," she said. It can create jobs, incubate small businesses, protect property values and increase the community options for goods and services.

"I think this is something that is needed now," Nickels said.

Nickels, a former employee of the Boys and Girls Clubs elsewhere, threw her support to the Nome Community Center Boys and Girls Club program.

"I know that once we lose a program it is hard to get it back," she

Tim Smith, president of Nome Fishermen's Assn. spoke to the Council of the need for fish hatcheries to bring back the abundance to fishing in the region. He proposed putting $100,000 into a hatchery set up at Hobson Creek. Smith planned to submit copies of his written proposal to Council members at a later

The Council said they could see combining some of the projects "to get a bigger bang for the buck," and encouraged those with proposals for youth projects to meet to avoid duplications and return to the Sept. 24 meeting with additional information. The meeting at Nome City Hall is open to the public.

DOT closes main runway again

By Diana Haecker

The Dept. of Transportation and Public Facilities on Monday closed the main east-west runway of the Nome International Airport again to continue working on the emergency repair project at the west end of the runway.

A reoccurring dip there needed fixing and to do so, DOT contractors cut open the asphalt and are waiting on a special crane that is used for what they call dynamic compaction. The crane is on a mainline barge, which was held up to arrive in Nome's port due to high winds and rough seas. According to DOT spokeswoman Meadow Bailey, the crane's estimated arrival time is either September 19 or 20.

The special crane is needed to essentially drop a very heavy weight down to the ground and thereby compact the material underneath so that the settling won't occur in the future. Then, the contractors need to pour asphalt over it and finish the job off with striping the runway.

With snow flying on the hill tops surrounding Nome and frozen puddles in lower elevations, the construction season is quickly coming to an end.

The runway closure in August has caused delays in jet service to Nome because the remaining runway is shorter and only approachable from the south. This allows jets only to land in favorable weather and cloud GATHERING - Sandhill cranes were gathering in great numbers last weekend to start their fall migration.

The Chief's Notes

By Nome Police Chief John Papasodora

Fall is a great time, in fact one of my favorite times of the year. The changing colors, the cool breeze and crisp fall mornings are a wonderful time. During fall, many of us engage in traditional activities in preparation for winter: berry picking, fish and meat canning, hunting and many other things that have helped us all make it through a cold and menacing winter. It has also become a time of the year when incomes are infused with the Alaska Permanent Fund Dividend that most Alaska residents receive in October or November. Some of us use this money to build tuition value for our children, catch up on bills, buy extra food or in many cases, to top off the oil tank before the cold grip of winter en-

But unfortunately, the Permanent Fund Dividend also provides opportunities for those of more questionable character to prev upon others and to quickly abscond with their PFD.

I have seen young people carrying cases of alcohol out of our local liquor stores and wondered how much that alcohol would be going for in a dry village and sold to others at exorbitant prices. I also wonder how many people use their PFD to purchase illicit drugs and further enrich those who erode the structure of the community. And I think often about the children who endure the cold of winter with inadequate winter gear, go hungry or have no heat in their homes because of the choices made on how to spend 'their' PFD.

With the PFD come projected increases in drug and alcohol consumption that always comes with a wave of victimization: the increase of alcoholfacilitated sexual assault; the rise in domestic violence; and both children and adults waiting in fear for whatever bad event may enter their lives next. Drug and alcohol abuse take a staggering toll on our community both today and in the impacts affecting the

The Nome Police are committed to making Nome a safe and secure place to live. We need the community to help us reduce the effects of drugs and alcohol in our community. It only takes a moment to call NPD (443-5262) to report alcohol or drug activities. You can remain anonymous if you choose to. It also only takes a moment to call the Troopers (443-5525) and let them know that a person is traveling to a village with a large quantity of alcohol or you can call NPD and we will pass the information to AST. And it only takes a moment to call the Office of Children's Services (1-800-353-2650) to report that children are being neglected or endangered because their caregivers are incapable of providing for their welfare. It only takes a minute to do so many things that can help so many people.

concept is that people could come to the sobering center themselves, if they're able to, or are brought in by family members or by the police.

The capacity of the sobering center is between six and 12 "clients" at a time.

A second component to the Wellness Center would be outpatient and individual counseling services. BHS already does that with substance abuse patients by providing group therapy, three nights a week. These counseling sessions would stay in the current BHS facility, across the street from the NSHC hospital. The outpatient treatment would be also bolstered by traditional activities. The existing outpatient group would move to the Wellness Center as will all of BHS services, Murphy said.

The next component of the Welless Center is an intensive outpatient treatment that offers evening group sessions, family and individual counseling. That treatment program will be able to take care of 20 clients and would be housed in the old hospital

An even higher level of care would be given by day treatment services. The day treatment would span a 12-hour period of treatment every day. Group work, counseling as well as traditional and cultural activities fill out the time between 9 a.m. and 9 p.m.

The Wellness Center plans to also offer sober housing. This is necessary, Murphy explains, to house patients from out of town to offer a safe and sober place while undergoing treatment. This would be available for 20 clients.

There was a plan to incorporate the current NEST emergency shelter in their facilities, but those plans have been scrapped for now. Murphy said that NEST was concerned about the Wellness Center's no smoking on the property policy and the distance from downtown. Murphy said that NEST will pursue program services with the Alaska Mental Health Trust Authority and that the Wellness Center and NEST would work as part-The Alaska Mental Health Trust

Authority and the State's Division of Mental Health have contributed so far $100,000 per year for three years to finance the planning stages. Now, the Foraker Group is lending its expertise in further planning. They sent an architect to look at the existing structure and to see what is needed and what the costs are to remodel the building to fit the Wellness Center's needs. Lance Johnson said that the Foraker Group also helps to develop a business plan. Norton Sound Health Corporation CEO Deven Parlikar said that the Wellness Center is long overdue for this region. "Although we believe that each community embraces wellness, the need for a Day Treatment Facility is paramount and we are excited to be selected by the Foraker Group for the Pre-Development Initiative for Liitfik, the St. Lawrence Island Yupik word selected by the Cultural Committee for The Wellness Center," said Parlikar. Liitfik means "a place to learn, a place to be sober, a place to become conscious.'

Johnson, Jay David, Parlikar and Cultural Committee co-chairs Lucy Apatiki and Emma Olanna traveled to Washington D.C. in late August to present the Wellness Center's concept to Indian Health Services and the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. Murphy said the concept is unique because "it brings the regional culture back as part of the solution.'

The next step is that the NSHC board of directors approve of the plan and place the Wellness Center on the state's legislative priority list to seek "brick and mortar" money to begin the project. If all goes as planned, BHS officials hope to open the doors to most programs of the Wellness Center come June 2014.

The Council told Sackett, just get back with a plan on paper for moving the building and getting it out of the derelict and eyesore column. When Sackett told them he couldn't move it maybe until next summer, some Council members, including Knodel, wanted the exterior of the building dressed up a bit.

LOCAL

Visited at his business Monday, Sackett assumed a what-are-theytalking-about position.

"Don't we need housing? I'm going to tear down the back part of Soap-'n-Suds and put it on that lot behind my business. It's a good, solid building," Sackett said. "I'm going to make it look nice and put in some efficiency apartments. That's what we need."

Sure, the building can be moved, Sackett said.

We have the materials ready. We're going to rebuild the one corner that is rotten. We already welded together two "H" beams to span the length underneath. Then we are going to put it on rollers and take it down the street, keeping it under the wires as possible," he explained. "Of course I'm going to make it nice. I'm not going to leave it an eyesore.'

With labor shortages in his businesses, he hasn't had time to get to the project this fall. Sackett said. First he has to tear down what is on his back lot, he said, and then move the Wien Building next summer.

What about making the Wien Building more eye pleasing in the meantime?

"I can put on some Tyvek wrap if that's what they want," Sackett said, explaining that if he put up temporary siding it would cost a bundle and it would be displaced during next summer's move.

On Monday, Bahnke affirmed the City's position that the building is back on the abatement list.

"Sackett was given a short grace period in which to provide a written plan for the moving the building. He has not done that. He leaves the City with no choice but to demolish it, she said.

Knodel had the same take.

"He has not done anything. It goes back on the abatement list to be torn down," she said.

Meanwhile, what some Alaskans love and what some hate to see came settling down on Newton and Anvil peaks Monday—snow, hereabouts called Termination Dust-ending construction plans until next sum-

State to evaluate NSEDC and other CDQ companies

By Laurie McNicholas

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. will undergo a thorough performance review in November, along with five other companies in the Western Alaska Community Development Quota Program.

The CDQ program was launched in 1992 by the North Pacific Fishery Management Council to promote sustainable economic growth in eligible Western Alaska villages through participation in commercial fishery harvests in the Bering Sea and Aleutian Islands area. The program subsequently was authorized under the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act (MSA).

The program receives an annual allocation of 10 percent of BSAI fishery harvests, the most lucrative of which are pollock, cod and crab. The fishery resources given to the program are allocated among the six CDQ groups. Legislation passed by Congress in 2006 amended the CDQ program section of the MSA and established each company's quota shares at current levels.

The amendment also mandated a CDQ program evaluation by the State of Alaska in 2012 and every 10 years afterward.

The initial review period extends from April 2006 through December

State regulations for the decennial review based on the CDQ program section of the MSA took effect Sept. 7 and are posted at the Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development website.

Evaluation criteria

Each CDQ entity will conduct an internal program evaluation using the following criteria: Changes in population, poverty level and economic development in the entity's member villages. Also taken into account is the overall financial performance of the entity, including fishery and non-fishery investments

PFD falls to $878

Revenue Commissioner Bryan Butcher on Tuesday afternoon announced that the Alaska Permanent Fund Division set this year's PFD amount at $878.

This is a sharp decline from last year's PFD of $1,174.

The dividends will be distributed beginning October 4, 2012.

in the entity; and employment, scholarships and training supported by the entity; and achievement of the entity's community development plan.

Each CDQ entity will assign relative values to the criteria to reflect the needs of its villages. The value assigned to all four criteria will total 100 points, and each entity will allocate the total number of points among the criteria at its sole discre-

Evaluation team

The evaluation team will be the commissioners of the Alaska Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development, the Dept. of Fish and Game and Dept. of Labor and Workforce Development, or their designees. The team will evaluate each CDQ entity's determination of whether the entity maintained or improved its overall performance with respect to the criteria.

On behalf of the team, the DCCED will provide written notice to each CDQ entity and the National Marine Fisheries Service of the state's recommendation whether the CDQ entity has or has not maintained or improved its overall performance. An entity that has not done so could lose up to 10 percent of its quota share. The NMFS will make the determination.

A CDQ entity may request a hearing to submit oral testimony or additional written documentation to the evaluation team in regard to the state's recommendation.

CDO companies

Six CDQ companies represent a total of 65 western Alaska communities located within 50 nautical miles of the coast. They are the Aleutian Pribilof Island Community Development Assn., 6 villages; Bristol Bay Economic Development Corp., 17 villages; Central Bering Sea Fishermen's Assn., 1 village; Coastal Villages Region Fund, 20 villages; NSEDC, 15 villages; and Yukon Delta Fisheries Development Assn., 6 villages.

NPS School Board hears Strategic Plan updates

By Lori Head

The September 13 Nome Public School Board meeting was two hours long and packed with updates from "primary reporters" on everything from kilowatt-hour savings due to the new LED lights to an "Achieve 3000 Reading Comprehension Program" for the 5-8 grade students. Superintendent Mike Brawner explained that the Strategic Plan was completed in the Fall of 2010 consisting of five major goals broken down into fifteen strategies. Almost two years after the plan's inception the board received a written status report, as well as oral reports, from school leaders regarding the Strategic Plan.

LED lights

Maintenance Foreman Bill Potter shared the good news that NJUS has told him that preliminary numbers show "significant savings" due to the new LED lights at the Nome Elementary School and the swimming pool. The lights at NES are saving the district 10,000 kWh per month and the security lights at NBHS 5,000 kWh per month.

Future plans include replacing the lights in the Dept. of Transportation offices and requesting support to replace the lights at NBHS.

National Merit Semifinalist

Nick Morgan, a senior at NBHS, has been named a National Merit Semifinalist, an honor bestowed upon only 16,000 students in the United States. National Merit Finalists will be announced in February.

Student testing

Testing Coordinator and Counselor Janeen Sullivan explained various strategies that the district uses to help students earn proficiency on state tests including providing teachers and librarians color-coded Lexile data for each Measurement Academic Progress (MAP) assessment event. Students receive a Lexile number associated with their reading ability that translates into a color that they can then look for on the books in either school's library.

Sullivan also mentioned Residual Analysis Tool data shared with staff at an in-service. She explained that with this new data, the State projects how a student should perform, based on past performance and the difficulty of the test, and then the difference between what the state projected and the actual results of the student is the Residual Analysis Tool. The tool can help show which questions students excel at or struggle with, and also looks at the depth of knowledge of each question so teachers can spot weaknesses in areas such as recall or comprehension, according to Sullivan.

Technology update

Technology Director Robin Johnson mentioned that a new wireless network was installed at the Elementary School in August.

After "rolling out" about 200 iPads to all junior high students, there was a well attended parent night. Johnson said that it has "totally, already changed what the classroom looks like in the junior high."

"Achieve 3000" software was recently purchased by the district to address the reading comprehension levels in grades 5-8, explained Brawner. "In a nutshell, it takes nonstudent's reading ability," explained Johnson. "So when the teachers go in and set up their class, they'll put the Lexile reading level of each student in the data base. Then when they say, 'OK, go out read this article on the presidential election,' and the kids log in, they're all going to get the same content but it will be tailored to their Lexile level. So, if they're reading at a third grade level as an eighth grader, they're going to get an article that has the same content but is written at a third grade level...whereas, if it's a ninth grader reading at an eleventh grade level they'll get a higher end article that covers the same information.'

Johnson did warn the board that, "It seems like there's more and more resources that are internet based [...] Bandwidth is starting to be a daily conversation."

"Scott and Bob Show"

Jr./Sr. High Principal Scott Handley and Elementary Principal Bob Grimes tag-teamed a presentation citing numerous, positive accomplishments at both schools in the brief amount of time that school doors have been open.

Grimes noted that a couple of his teachers had visited the homes of every student in their class in an effort to have positive relationships with parents or guardians.

Handley explained that after he and Counselor Terry Roelfsema met with the high school students and surveyed interests, he is pursuing a driver's education class, partnering with NACTEC. It would take place during "zero hour," which is afterschool from 3:10 to 4:00 p.m., and be offered first to juniors and seniors with the goal of graduating every student with a diploma and a driver's license. Other student interests included heavy equipment training, vehicle maintenance, (CNA) Certified Nursing Assistant, culinary, forensics, diesel engines, sewing, (EMT) Emergency Medical Technician, HAM radio, medical assistant and subsistence training.

Special Education audit

Special Education Coordinator Sandy Harvey informed the board that the State Department of Education, Special Education Department, conducted a "compliance monitoring" last week, which takes place every five years and the district should receive a report from the State in October.

Reading Mastery Program

Jon Berkeley, Director of Federal Programs, welcomed Annie Conger in her new position as Alaska Native Education Coordinator stating she is "doing just a fantastic job."

He also commended Mari Lammer and Whitney Pong for the "wonderful job" they've done working with grades 1-4 and getting Kindergarten "up and running" with the Reading Mastery Intervention Program. They are addressing intensive level students through the day with a 60-minute block using the Reading Mastery Program. Grades 5-6 have two teachers dedicated to the reading mastery part, so before long Berkeley sees all Elementary grades "full-on in Read 90."

Funding through partnerships

Brawner expressed appreciation to all the local agencies that support Nome's students. Specifically, he mentioned a Youth Activity Grant that he is working on with the Nome Common Council. It would involve afterschool activities including swimming lessons for all students and four activities each at the elementary level and Jr./Sr. high level. At the elementary level it would be bowling and soccer at the recreation center; and at the school, NYO and an Eskimo dance class. The older student's activities are yet to be determined but would be designed around their interests.

Partner in Education awards

CHARR was recognized for its support and $25,000 donation. Carol Brown accepted the award. Nome PTSA, particularly President Julie Kelso was recognized for her hard work and dedication to Nome Public Schools.

August students of the month

Jr. High School student Katherine Scott and Sr. High student Dawn Wehde were recognized as students of the month. Cheering family attended the meeting, including Dawn's mother Lisa Wehde via Skype, as both students received the award.

The Nome Board of Education will meet again, Thursday, September 27, in a work session. The public is invited and encouraged to attend.

Research finds childhood obesity impairs the teenage brain

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Teenagers with metabolic syndrome, a combination of obesity and pre-diabetic health problems, have a smaller brain volume and poorer academic performance compared to healthy teenagers, according to a recent study published in the journal Padiatrics.

The study, conducted by researchers from New York University School of Medicine, evaluated 49 teenagers who had at least three of five symptoms of metabolic syndrome: central abdominal obesity; high blood pressure; high blood fats; low HDL (high density lipoprotein or good cholesterol); and elevated blood sugars (borderline diabetes).

Compared to teenagers without the syndrome, children with metabolic syndrome performed worse on reading, math and attention tests. Intelligence scores also trended lower in the teens with metabolic syndrome.

Brain MRI scans of children with metabolic syndrome showed that the hippocampus, a central part of the brain involved in memory formation, is smaller in adolescents with metabolic syndrome compared to healthy children. The researchers also found that the brains of children with metabolic syndrome have areas of diminished white matter organization.

White matter is made up of nerve cells in the brain that conduct signals from one part of the brain to other parts.

These problems have long been known to occur in adults with pre-diabetes, obesity or metabolic syndrome. But this is the first time the syndrome has been shown to affect the brains of school-age children.

The research is timely because the number of children with metabolic syndrome in the U.S. is climbing at an alarming rate. In many communities, one out of every ten teenagers already meets the criteria for having metabolic syndrome. This means that at up to ten percent of our children may be suffering academically from a condition resulting from what they are being fed, not necessarily from a school curriculum.

Obesity-related health problems have what the authors of the study call "a dampening effect on academic performance" which in turn has an impact on professional potential and lifelong learning.

The solution is simple and obvious. Children need nutritious food and daily activity. Weight loss and daily activity have been shown to prevent the progression of pre-diabetes to overt diabetes in adults. Experts believe that the same is true for children.

But a child's life is often full of sedentary time and poor food choices. Even outside of school hours, most childhood activity involves sitting in front of a computer, television screen or a handheld game-system.

Calorie-dense, nutritional-poor foods with sugary beverages too often form the staples of the typical teenage diet. These food choices may negatively affect the learning process and counteract efforts by educators to improve academic achievement.

Furthermore, as Antonio Convit, MD, one of the authors of the current study, states, "It is imperative that we take obesity and physical activity seriously in children. In this country, we're taking away gym class in order to give children more class time in an effort to improve school performance, but that effort may be having the exact opposite effect."

In the future, well-child exams, especially in teenagers, may involve checking cholesterol levels and blood sugar levels in addition to weight and blood pressure checks in an effort to catch signs of metabolic syndrome before brain function begins to decline.

To prevent metabolic syndrome, children should be taught to cover half of their plates with fruits and vegetables at mealtime, avoid sugary beverages and get at least 60 minutes of vigorous physical activity daily.

Metabolic syndrome is a preventable disease, and like most preventable illnesses, a little investment today in healthy foods and physical activity will go a long way toward preventing costly problems in the future. It may even make the difference in your child's future test scores. Maybe an apple a day should be thought of as preparation for the SAT.

Junior High and JV let the sand fly in Bethel

It's called the Pit. It's also been called one of the most challenging cross-country race courses in Western Alaska. Why? Pit is short for sandpit, the terrain that constitutes the Bethel 5k (3.1 mile) course.

Last weekend, ten Nanook Junior Varsity and seven Junior High runners represented Nome on this arduous track.

Nine of the ten JV runners competed against what seemed like an army of Bethel Regional High School harriers in the Boys Varsity race. Faced with an uphill start, the boys dug their toes into the crumbly earth and fought across the winding trail that circles the Pit. James Jorgensen was the first Nome finisher, arriving at 23 minutes 29 seconds and in 11th position. Next came Bobby Pate in 15th, and senior Nick Morgan five seconds behind in 16th place. Nolan Horner and Oliver Hoogendorn rounded out the scorers for Nome, contributing 19 and 23 points respectively.

Although team awards were not given, Chevak Boys Varsity defeated Bethel with a score of 36 against 40 for BRHS. Nome scored 84 points. Other villages competing without a full team of five were Kwethluk.

Akiachak, Tuntutuliak and Newtok. On the Girls Varsity side, only

Bethel had a full team present, giving them a perfect score of 15. The Lady Warriors also secured the top 4 spots, led by Haley O'Brian at 25:35. Alexis Hutson, Nome's sole entrant, placed 13th with a time of 33:59 minutes.

Junior High competitors ran a single-lap 2.5-kilometer course. Harrison Moore of Nome pulled in second with a time of 12:11, Wilson Hoogendorn in fourth with 12:36 min., and Jamie Yi in sixth position with a time of 13 minutes. The next Nome competitor to finish was Dane Robinson in 16th with 13:52, and John Wade finished 35th with a time of 15:32 minutes.

In the Junior High Girls division, Bianca Trowbridge finished 13th in 15:39, 37th overall, and Audrey Lawrence finished 50th overall.

On Saturday, Sept. 22 the Nanooks head to the Regional Competition hosted in Unalakleet. The meet will be a qualifier for State Championships at Bartlett High School in Anchorage Sept. 29.

Lady Nanooks volleyball team continue early season roll

By Stephen Palmatier

The story was much of the same last weekend for the Nome Lady Nanooks as they once again swept their opponents in home games in Nome with two victories over the Bethel Lady Warriors. This kept the Lady Nanooks undefeated so far in this early portion of the season. It has not been just the fact that they have not lost a match, but rather the way they have dominated their opponents thus far having not dropped a set all

While the Bethel Lady Warriors were only the second team the Nome ladies have faced this season, the Bethel ladies posed a few more challenges for the Nanooks than did the Kotzebue Lady Huskies, but nonetheless were still no match for the depth and talent of the Lady Nanooks.

In the first match behind a relatively big crowd dressed in blue, the Nome ladies won convincingly 25-6, 25-8, and 25-16, feeding off the crowd's energy all evening. The first two sets of this match were the best the ladies have looked so far this season, dominating the Lady Warriors in every facet of the game. But in the third set, things became a little more interesting as the Lady Warriors made a bit of a run late in the set before Nome closed it out with a run of Lucas Frost, the head coach of the Lady Nanooks said that the challenge of the third set may have been his doing. "I wanted to make sure all the girls get playing time. I probably put some of the girls in at awkward times where they are not used to playing at practice. I had a lot of our players in inexperienced locations," said Frost.

Besides some coaching decisions in the third set, the trend so far for this Nome squad has been to play a little less effective as the match wears on. Ariana Horner, a junior who tied for the lead in kills for the ladies this weekend with 13, says that she thinks her team loses its competitive edge as the match progresses.

"We sink down to the other team's level. Our energy is going down and so is our play. We have to be able to just keep our level of play up throughout," said Horner.

In the second match the following day, it was a little bit more of a challenge consistently, but the Nome ladies were able to win once again, 25-14, 25-13 and 25-12. In this match, it was different than the previous night as the ladies got off to somewhat of a rocky start, playing shaky enough to get Coach Frost angry at them after the point. The coach's outburst seemed to get his player's attention and they played better throughout the match. It was the first match where the ladies showed that they could play better or as effective the longer the match went on.

Over the weekend, the ladies continued to do what had been working out well for them so far this year, particularly in kills and serving. In the first match, they had 30 kills and on Saturday, 26. Senior Devynn Johnson, like Horner had 13 kills to lead the team and senior Taylor Pomeranz added 11 of her own. There were also 19 service aces by the ladies on Friday and 18 on Satur-

The ladies, who are now 6-0 on the season, have yet to be tested, but that could change this coming weekend as they will participate in the West High Volleyball tournament on Friday and Saturday, Sept. 21 and 22, in Anchorage. The ladies, who played well in Anchorage before the season, will be able to gauge how they stack up with other teams in the state at the tournament. Coach Frost thinks that they will play effective in the upcoming tournament.

If they have two different pools in the tournament, I think we can win the silver pool and do well in the gold pool," said Frost. Horner believes the same. "I am really excited to play some good competition. I think the competition will really improve our team," said Horner.

Whatever does happen in the upcoming tournament this weekend, one thing the ladies know is that their wins so far in the season are a good way to tune up for the challenges that lie ahead. Coach Frost thinks that he has seen steady improvement so far from his squad throughout the season. "They're improving on the skill that they had at the beginning of the year, and that's all I can ask for right now," said Frost.

Nome cross-country runners perform solid in Talkeetna

By Stephen Palmatier

Last weekend, the undefeated Nome Nanooks cross-country team took their longest trip yet, traveling to the Su-Valley Invitational, held at the hilly, forested cross-country trail at Su Valley High School in Talkeetna. Once again, much like the first two meets of their season, the Nanooks showed that they are a team to be reckoned with.

The ladies won the Invitational, finishing with two girls in the top five. Rosa Schmidt finished in second place while Senora Ahmasuk finished in fifth rounding out the top five. There was also a solid showing by Hannah Tozier, who finished in eighth place.

While the boys' squad did not win the meet they had a strong showing. The boys were once again led by Tim Schmidt, who finished in third place in the race. Following Schmidt was Leif Erikson, Junyor Erikson, James Horner and Degnan Lawrence.

With the girls team certainly showing to be a major contender, the Nanooks team will be able to show what it is made of next weekend when they head to Unalakleet for the regional meet and in two weeks to the State's Championship tourna-

LOW WATER— A strong north wind with gusts up to 38 mph pushed the water southward and left some boats and dredges high and dry at the mouth of the Snake River in Nome on Sunday, September 16.

THE DOCK WALK

A break in the rainy and stormy weather gave way to glassy waters and sunny skies - at least for the better part of last week until horizontal, wind-driven rain and rough seas dominated the picture again on Sunday. With strong winds from the north, water was pushed southward. leaving boats sitting on nearly bare ground. While the Port of Nome is still a very busy place, Harbormaster Joy Baker reports that things have begun to slow down. Last week's activities at the harbor saw a Crowley fuel barge dock at the City dock to click their hoses into the headers and fill up fuel tanks at the tank farm behind the city pad. At the same time, a lighter barge sidled up next to the tanker and took on product for a village trip. The drilling platform Polar Bear hired on to perform a 40-day sample drilling campaign by the South African offshore mining company AuruMar, has demobilized its equipment, sent the crew home and sailed back home south. Two research vessels called on the port of Nome, with the research boat Bristol Explorer leaving on Tuesday, Sept. 11 and the Professor Khromov leaving on Monday, Sept. 16. The lighter barge for Crowley came back on Saturday and as of Monday, waited out bad weather that stirred up the seas further out. Two gravel barges took material out and gravel operations are winding down. The Canadian icebreaker Polar Prince is still anchored out at sea chored out at sea.

Three sailboats that have come to Nome via the Northwest Passage are currently anchored at the small boat harbor. The latest arrival besides the Anna and Jonathon is the sailing vessel Belzebub. The sailing boats Roxane and Teleport are overwintering in Nome and have been hauled to the city's storage facility.

The first snowflakes were flying on Sunday afternoon, so it's not long before harbor activities completely slow down. Yet to arrive in Nome are two mainline fuel barges and two mainline freight barges.

To the editor, September 14, 2012

I want to respond to the statements in Dan Harrelson's letter in the September 6, 2012 edition of The Nome Nugget regarding Norton Sound salmon enhancement. Dan says NSEDC has not blocked salmon enhancement in the region.

I have been involved in Norton Sound salmon enhancement from the first projects in 1991 before the CDQ program came along. I have attended most of the meetings and studied all of the reports and documentation and the facts show that despite NSEDC spending $7.5 million during 2000-11 on "salmon rehabilitation and enhancement" its involvement has done more harm than good.

That's a lot of money and my question to Dan is: where are the fish? 1983 is the last time it was as bad as it was this year. If NSEDC has been secretly enhancing salmon as Dan says, they sure don't have much to show for it.

In his list of NSEDC accomplishments, Dan confuses counting fish with actually enhancing the salmon stocks. All fish counting does is let you know how few fish we have; it does nothing to increase their numbers.

Dan talks about the truth and then claims, "NSEDC has historically been the largest supporter of Smith and his Nome Fishermen's Association. From 2005-2008, NSEDC designated more than $350,000 in funding toward his Hobson Creek fisheries project." The truth is, although we made good use of the money we got from NSEDC, Nome Fishermen's Association member donations provide the majority of our support. If you know anything about hatcheries, you would know that it would be impossible to operate a hatchery for four years on $350,000. Dan knows that because we documented all of our expenses in detail, provided those records to NSEDC and their staff went over them with a fine toothed comb, right down to the

We don't know anything about what happened to the $3,154,702 NSEDC spent on salmon enhancement during 2005-08 because all of their financial records are kept secret.

During the four years from 2007-10, NSEDC forked over $442,227 to Dan Harrelson. We used the $350,000 we got from NSEDC over the four-year period to produce hundreds of thousands of juvenile pink, chum and silver salmon. That's fully documented. I don't know what we got from the money NSEDC gave to Dan and I doubt very much that there is any documentation on that. I sure haven't seen any.

One thing the NSEDC records show is that Dan worked 5 hours per week for the $442,227, so he was making $425.00 an hour. That's good pay.

Let's talk about Dan's statement, "projects run by NSEDC, deliver significant benefits to the region and would be sorely missed if stopped."

The best salmon enhancement project we ever did here was fertilizing Salmon Lake. During four summers from 1997-2001 we applied 160 tons of nitrogen and phosphorus fertilizer to Salmon Lake and then, inexplicably, NSEDC stopped supporting the project and as everybody who fishes for red salmon knows, that was

Lucille McDaniel

Lucille (Karmun) McDaniel was born on July 29, 1950 in Deering to Dan and Ethel Karmun. Lucille and her twin, Laraine, were a blessing to Dan and Ethel who had lost their first born, Shirley Kay, when she was still an infant.

Lucille McDaniel

Being the eldest of what would become eleven siblings, Lucille learned a quiet and calm patience that she displayed throughout her life. She had a sense of duty and great respect for her parents. After high school, when Lucille and Laraine decided to attend an administrative class in Anchorage, the girls told their parents they would have to come too. "So we did," Grandpa says when he tells the story.

In Anchorage, Lucille met Bruce when he was passing through after serving a tour of duty in Vietnam. Their three-month courtship led to 41 years of marriage. They spent their working lives in Nome and raised their six children, Kathy, Keith, Kevin, Daniel Kurt, Glenn Kirk and Kelly. When it was time to retire, they spent their winters in Ohio, where Bruce's family is from, and summers at their camp in Council. Lucille was blessed with many new and good friends in Ohio.

Lucille loved baking, playing scrabble, cards and bingo, picking blueberries and was diligent about sending cards for loved ones' birthdays. She is affectionately remembered for her thoroughness and taking time to do things her way. She would do ten chores on her way to bed and five things before walking out the door.

Always thinking of others, Lucille prepared loved ones by talking about all the people she would get to see again. She fondly recalled places they would visit near Deering and the games they used to play. We know she is in a better place and that loved ones were waiting with open arms.

Lucille is survived by her husband, Bruce McDaniel; daughter Kathryn; sons: Keith and his wife Melanie, Kevin and his wife Jennifer, Dan and his wife Christine, Glenn and his wife Joni and Kelly; grandchildren: Cameron and Brandi; Taylor, Bubba and Daphany; Alex, Quinn and Lola; Jaime, Wyatt, Rayna, and Kami Lu; and Kevin Craig. Siblings: Elsie, Edna, Gloria, Judy, Bert, Porter, Harry and Donny; brothers- and sisters-in-law: Scott and Nancy, Sherry and Mickey, Carroll "Punky" and Sue, and Jeanine and Steve; many nieces and nephews, great nieces and nephews, aunts and cousins.

She is preceded in death by her twin, Laraine Garrison; sister Shirley Kay; brothers Glenn and Danny, nephew Gary Garrison; uncle Delbert Outwater, father- and mother-inlaw Meredith and Ruth McDaniel; grandparents Harry and Nellie Karmun; Papa Elmer Davis and grandmother Lucy Outwater.

Lucille passed away on September 14, 2012 and her ashes will be spread in Council at her favorite berry picking spot.

Thank you to those near and far who have sent condolences. We feel greatly loved and supported.

Acknowledgement

The Family and Friends of John Bunce would like to express our sincere thanks for the kind words and other expressions of love during our time of great sadness.

John's mother would like for all who knew John to come and join with her in celebrating her Son's life with a 30 day memorial potluck feast. We will honor John with words, music, laughter, tears, good food, and the company of those who love him. The feast will be followed by a bonfire on West Beach, and the spreading of John's ashes on the waters just off shore.

John was greatly loved, and this potluck feast is our Cherokee way of celebrating the wonderful gift of John's life; no alcohol please.

Seven years after the fertilization program was initiated, the Salmon Lake red salmon run came in at 92,292, better than anyone expected. NSEDC wasn't prepared to deal with success and without fertilization; it is thought that the large numbers of juvenile salmon produced by too many salmon spawning in the sterile water of the lake, starved. Seven years after fertilization was suspended, the run crashed and since 2008 we have been much worse off than we were before we started.

NSEDC is doing something with fertilizer now but it is too little and too late. It will be a long time before the run is restored, if it comes back at all. We need a comprehensive recovery plan for Salmon Lake but with NSEDC in the driver's seat, that is not happening.

One last thing, I heard a KNOM interviewer call the mist incubation project Charlie Lean is doing for NSEDC at the old reindeer plant a hatchery. That terminology is incorrect. The eggs aren't intended to hatch and that project is not intended to produce more fish for harvest because it is a research project. It has been ongoing now for 9 years but the results have never been evaluated.

The eggs incubated in this system are marked and Charlie has been recovering marks from fish that come back 4 years after the marked eggs are implanted. In 2011, the last year data are available, Charlie recovered only 2 marked fish from 512 samples collected in the Snake, Nome and Solomon Rivers. Those are pretty unimpressive results from such a costly project. NSEDC keeps all of its salmon project records confidential but from the data provided to the state, it appears to me that 7 times as many fish would have come back if NSEDC had done nothing and let the fish they took for eggs and milt in 2007 spawn naturally.

Why is NSEDC standing in the way of Norton Sound salmon enhancement you might ask and that's a good question. I think it is because they have invested so heavily in the pollock trawl industry, taking on tremendous debt in the process.

Salmon by catch is a huge problem for the pollock trawlers; especially now that the salmon disaster has hit the road system. The people who fish on the Kenai Peninsula have a lot more political clout than we do.

A meaningful reduction in salmon bycatch could make NSEDC's investments unprofitable and we need to reduce bycatch seriously if we want to save the salmon stocks. The National Marine Fisheries Service economist told us that chum salmon by catch reduction could reduce pollock B season profits by as much as 94% for shorebased trawlers like the 7 trawlers NSEDC just bought in Dutch Harbor for a reported $52 mil-

It would be nice if NSEDC would tell us themselves why they are against enhancing salmon production but so far they won't. They tell us that is because their affairs are private. I don't think that's right.

Nome celebrates first anniversary of being smoke free in public places

By Diana Haecker

There was a birthday cake, balloons and games, during last Thursday's celebration of Nome being smoke-free in public places for one year. The City of Nome joined the ranks of "smoke-free" cities in Alaska last year in September when an ordinance went into effect that banned smoking in public and work places. About 75 Nomeites turned out last week to celebrate the anniversary

Danielle Sylvester, who has been a driving force to bring the ordinance to the Council's and Nome's attention, said that she heard lots of positive feedback since the ordinance went into effect. "A bartender told me that he's a smoker and that he liked a smoke-free atmosphere much better," Sylvester said. An avid bingo player said she's enjoying the local Bingo parlor much more now that through the air. "I used to go to the Bingo hall and the ladies in the nonsmoking section would always have to smell the smoke," Susan Omiak said. "When people got close to calling Bingo they smoked even more and faster so there was a lot of smoke in the air. I like going to Bingo much more now.'

While smokers now have to put on their jackets and take it outside, the smoke cleared from inside, but another problem arose: cigarette butts littering the sidewalk. In the mornings, a carpet of cigarette butts covers the sidewalk in front of the local bars in Nome. "With ash cans and education, I know that problem is an easy one to solve," said Sylvester.

Not only did the City support the clean air movement with the ordinance, but the Nome Public School District also declared a tobacco-free policy and is enforcing tobacco rules in the schools. A look at the current Seawall reveals that teachers and staff do call on the police to come in when a student is caught with tobacco, confiscate the contraband and warn the student. And the consequences are not to be taken lightly. Sylvester, K-12 tobacco prevention program coordinator, said that kids caught with tobacco products have the option of either taking three days suspension or a day suspension and eight sessions in tobacco prevention program led by Sylvester. "During the sessions, we look at their motivations to use tobacco, why they use it and then we shift the focus in learning about the facts of tobacco use and why they shouldn't," Sylvester explained.

As a result of Nome having declared a ban on smoking in a public place, the Alaska Tobacco Control Alliance selected Nome as its venue to hold their annual summit, in May of this year. "We were up against Juneau, Anchorage and Kodiak but the Alliance chose Nome because it was a good time to celebrate the ordinance," said Sylvester.

Tara Schmidt now works at the Nome Community Center as the new tobacco prevention coordinator. In order to take the message one step further, she started conducting a survev of apartment complexes in Nome and multi-apartment housing to determine how prevalent smoking in multi-family housing is.

Sylvester said that she is thankful to the city council and the people of Nome to support the goal of creating a healthy community. "I'm proud of them for taking a stand and to make way for positive change," Sylvester said. "I do want to reinforce fact that this is not a rule to take away peoples' freedom, but that it just give people the right to breathe clean air.'

Sylvester now has her our eyes set on proposing a statewide law to ban smoking in public places as well as helping smokers to break with their habit. "My personal goal is to continue education and to support people who struggle with the addiction," Sylvester said.

The celebrations took place at Old St. Joe's Hall on Thursday evening, with fun games that required skills and lung capacity. There was a coffee bean game, to suck up a coffee bean with a straw and run to a different table and deposit the coffee bean. Kids also had fun with the game to keep balloons from falling to the ground by keeping them floating in the air with their own breath.

Nome mayor appointed to AK Arctic Policy Commission

By Diana Haecker

Heeding the recommendations of the Northern Waters Task Force, the Alaska State Legislature in its last session created an Alaska Arctic commission that is supposed to develop recommendations for an official Alaska Arctic policy. Last week Senate President Gary Stevens and House Speaker Mike Chenault announced their appointments to the 20-member commission and those include Nome Mayor Denise Michels, Michels secured the seat for a coastal community representative.

Michels said in an email exchange with The Nome Nugget that she is very honored to be appointed to the Alaska Arctic Policy Commis-

"As the Coastal Community representative on the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission, I will work with former Rep. Reggie Joule and Unalaska City Manager Chris Hladick and disseminate information through our membership with the Alaska Municipal League and through regional non-profits such as Kawerak so coastal communities are fully engaged in the public process," Michels wrote. "I addressed the Kawerak and NSHC joint board meeting last week on the increase in Arctic shipping."

During the joint boarding meeting, the two entities passed a joint resolution that urged Congress to ratify the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea.

Michels said that subsistence and food security are very important for coastal communities that depend on marine mammals and the fisheries for commercial fishing.

Michels said that she heard concerns during the joint board meeting about the need to balance the health of the ecosystem with responsible resource development as marine mammals and fish in their seasonal migration pass through the Bering Strait. She also heard the desire to be

Planning panel to set up annexation study

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Planning Commission has charged the City's contract planner with looking farther into the pros and cons of drawing new city limits around outlying areas by annexation.

The work would look into benefits for both sides of the current line as well as drawbacks for the "ins" and "outs" should annexation-a several year process-occur. The study will concentrate on costs and benefits related to utility service delivery, police protection and fire

"This is a decision to research annexation. This is not on the decision to annex," NPC President Tom Sparks made perfectly clear.

City Manager Josie Bahnke handed the commission the job to develop a work plan on how to proceed with researching the potential annexation effort, identified as a high priority in Nome's Comprehensive Plan 2020 approved by Nome Common Council earlier this year.

Among other issues, Eileen Bechtol of Bechtol Associates will look into current availability and cost of services in and outside the City's boundaries: fire calls, ambulance services, utilities, police protection, Nome Police Dept. and Alaska State Trooper services.

In other business the panel continued to look at ways to encourage code compliance. One program getting a close look would divide the town into grids by map, pull grid numbers out of

AGC settles with EPA over water violations

By Diana Haecker

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency last week said that Company has paid a $177,500 penalty for alleged Clean Water Act violations at the Rock Creek mine. The EPA alleges that the AGC violated permit requirements for controlling storm water pollution during construction activities between May 2009 and Septem-

The EPA said in a press release that AGC has taken corrective actions to comply by submitting and implementing an upgraded Stormwater Pollution Prevention Plan and reclaiming a portion of the area disturbed during construction.

"Polluted runoff can damage important habitat and harm Alaska's natural resources," said Jeff Ken manager of EPA Water Act Compliance Unit in Seattle. "Companies need to plan for and manage stormwater runoff from their construction sites, and investing the time and energy upfront is always better than repairing damage and paying penalties later.'

According to the EPA, they and the Alaska Department of Environmental Conservation performed six inspections at the mine between June 2009 and September 2011, which revealed numerous violations of federal construction stormwater regulations.

Infractions included drainage channels without rock armoring, creating bank erosion, and undercutting and sloughing of channel sidewalls. Inspectors also noted areas where proper erosion control measures were not installed or maintained, which caused the discharge of large amounts of silt and sediment into Rock Creek and Lindblom Creek.

ACG also failed to create, maintain, and implement an adequate continued on page 4

Letters -

To the Editor,

A letter recently circulated to media outlets and several other recipients accuses NSEDC once again of a laundry list of misdeeds.

While Tim Smith's continued rants are tiresome and disappointing, they are not totally unexpected. It's also no surprise that his conclusions are either outright wrong or based on a twisting of the facts.

You will likely hear from Smith this week telling you that NSEDC is trying to influence our upcoming member representative election by issuing a Community Benefit Share—a program that NSEDC has operated since 1999. Any allegation that NSEDC is using the Community Benefit Share to influence member community representative elections is absurd. Programs like the Community Benefit Share are exactly what NSEDC is supposed to do, giving communities the means to fill gaps in their resources and infrastructure. Sharing the profits of a strong financial year with our communities, rather than simply socking it away in the stock market, was a decision made with unanimous approval by NSEDC's board, and we are nothing but proud of the board's commitment to all NSEDC communities and youth.

Elections occur for NSEDC board seats every year in October, just as NSEDC annually holds a second quarter meeting in late July or early August, at which time the board may approve various projects that benefit member communities and residents. It is simply what NSEDC does in the goal of improving conditions for our member communities and their resi-

Smith's evidence-of-the-week that NSEDC is up to no good is our letter to municipalities informing them of the Community Benefit Share and asking about their planned use of the funds. For the past 12 years this letter has included a date by which NSEDC asks to hear back from municipalities. This date is included to help move the process forward and is not a hard deadline.

The City of Nome, as well as other municipalities, have been informed that they are not required to respond to NSEDC by announced date of Sept. 28. Many communities have in the past submitted their notifications well past the requested date, which never results in penalty or reduction in funds. Municipalities do not face any hard deadline for the program, and any unused funds

Smith also comes to the shocking conclusion that the board of directors did not authorize the date included in the letter. But what he doesn't tell you is that this is nothing new-NSEDC's staff has included a date in these letters for the past 12 years

NSEDC maintains a staff to administer our programs. While Smith is trying to tell you this is wrong, common sense should tell you that this is simply how companies governed by boards work. The board gives the major approvals and direction, staff handles the minutia. Deciding which date to include in a letter falls well within normal administrative duties, especially when that date has no bearing on a community's eligibility, receipt or use of program funds. What will be Smith's next revelation? Perhaps he will reveal the big secret that our staff answers the phones without prior board approval.

For two decades, NSEDC has initiated and conducted a wide variety of benefit and grant programs that occur throughout the year. We find it curious that Mr. Smith only acknowledges NSEDC's benefit programs right before an election. Makes you wonder just who is trying to influence its outcome. Simon Kinneen

To the Editor,

It costs $181 to fill up my truck's gas tank. Filling a 500-gallon heating fuel tank with oil costs $3,355. Those are amazing prices for fuel and it takes a lot of fuel to live in bulk fuel program. Can you guess which community residents don't get the benefit of this CDQ program subsidy? It's the one with 41 percent of the people in the region — Nome.

I have asked Janis Ivanoff many times why people who live in Nome are left out in the cold. Her answers don't make any sense to me and miss the point - something about NJUS and the City of Nome not wanting to participate in NSEDC's program. I'm not interested in getting cheaper fuel for NJUS or the city, I want to see lower prices when I gas up my vehicle or top off my heating fuel tank — like everybody else in the region.

Another reason I hear is that Nome people are so well off we can afford to pay higher prices for fuel. That doesn't hold much water either. The U.S. Census found that more people live in poverty in Nome than in any of the other Norton Sound community except Gambell and Savoonga. It's true that there are people in Nome who make a lot of money but that doesn't do much for the ones who don't and who still have to heat their homes and gas up their vehicles at these inflated prices.

The real reason that Nome is left out of NSEDC's fuel program comes down to our lack of effective representation on the NSEDC board of directors. I regularly attend NSEDC board meetings; I'm about the only person not on the NSEDC payroll who does. I have never heard Nome's representative on the NSEDC board speak up for our right to get the benefits of the fuel program. He doesn't speak up for Nome about much of anything

Every three years we have an opportunity to elect a person to represent us on the NSEDC board of directors. If you take a look at your fuel bills, I think you will see that it is time for a change.

A Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director. Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

The Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum continues the look back at the 1900 Nome Gold Rush with more perspective from Wilfred A. Mc-Daniel Sr. Herewith are more excerpts from "Alaska Beckons" written by Wilfred in 1943. His love of Nome is quite evident in that his experiences in this exquisite land are still fresh in his mind four decades later. Last week Wilfred concluded his eye witness account of the treacherous and unpredicted Bering Sea storm of September 9 and 10, 1900. This week, armed with the essential gold miner's trait of optimism, the boys make an asset out of the torrential rains

ALASKA BECKONS By Wilfred A. McDaniel Sr.

Following the destructive period of the September 9th and 10th storm, heavy rains fell, and the rough sea prevented any reconstructive work to be started. High tides still prevailed, and this condition would have made impossible any attempt to mine the lower ground, had we been equipped to do so. The heavy rains created a considerable flow of water in many of the draws and gullies draining the tundra, affording an abundance of water for sluicing, during the run-off. This we decided to make use of, and by digging a system of ditches the water was concentrated. Sluiceboxes were set up on the upper part of the beach and work was resumed. While the pay was not as good in this portion of the beach, the fact that the water cost nothing partly off-set the difference, and furthermore, there was no loss of time which would have resulted, had we waited for fair weather in which to get engine and pump in operation. After a few days the rain gradually decreased, with a corresponding falling off in the water from the tundra, and after about ten days of sluicing we were forced to abandon the ditch supply, it becoming inadequate.

As September advanced, calm weather came, clear and colder, but promising a few weeks more of moderate weather, during what remained of the short open season.

The engine had received no damage. A thorough overhauling and cleaning to remove sand and grit, and it was soon put in running order. Pump foundations were leveled, suction pipe attached and sluicing soon went on as before. However, our troubles were not yet over. From all the varied difficulties experienced so far, nothing now seemed possible to happen which had not already occurred and which, in a measure, we were prepared for. But Alaska has her joking moods too, as we were soon to experience!

ROCK CREEK MINE (top) — The future of the Rock Creek mine and mill complex is still undecided as BSNC officials weigh their options.

ROCK CREEK (right) — EPA regulators said that AGC have implemented corrective measures as shown here with erosion control around a culvert funneling Rock Creek underneath the new Glacier Creek Road.

Rock Creek

Stormwater Pollution Prevention Plan that met all requirements of the National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System General Permit for Storm Water Discharges from Construction Activities.

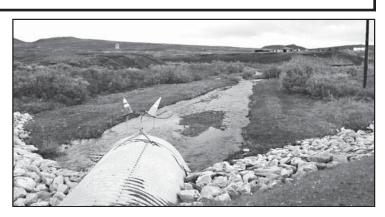

This was not the first time that AGC was charged with storm water run off violations. EPA Region 10's Enforcement and Compliance Program officials noted that there was a previous enforcement action against AGC for alleged violations of the Clean Water Act up to September 2008. That action was resolved in April 2009 with a consent decree and payment of a penalty.

The Rock Creek mine had been non-operational and in maintenance and care status since November 2008. Alaska Gold Company, subsidiary of Canadian NovaGold Resources, is the owner of the mine. After the NovaGold board of directors decided to shutter the mine for good, AGC started to implement a two-phase reclamation plan this year. NovaGold Vice President, Environment, Health, Safety and Sustainability Ron Rimelman said in an email exchange with The Nome Nugget that they are nearing completion of Phase I closure activities at Rock Creek. "The tailings facility dam breach was completed earlier this year and we have now eliminated all of the sources of water that required ongoing water treatment," Rimelman wrote. "As a result, the water treatment plant has been shut down. We expect to finish all Phase I work within the next few weeks and we only have a few remaining Alaska Gold Corporation employees at the mine. We have not begun Phase II activities."

The regional Native Corporation, Bering Straits Native Corporation, has been in negotiations with AGC to buy the Rock Creek mine and also the remainder of the Alaska Gold Company. BSNC CEO and President Gail Schubert told the Nugget that BSNC and Novagold are continuing to move towards an agreement, which will transfer the Rock Creek Mine and other Alaska Gold Company assets to BSNC. "It is anticipated that the agreement will be finalized by the end of November," Schubert said.

As for the future of the mine, it is yet not certain which route BSNC will take. "We are currently examining two possible futures for Rock Creek: reclamation of the mine, or a restart of milling operations. If the mine is restarted, it will be on a much smaller scale than before. Our focus is whether the mine can be operated profitably, considering the best environmental practices available to industry. If these objectives cannot be achieved, then we will move forward with reclamation of Rock Creek," Schubert wrote.

Vote for Don Stiles

for Nome's NSEDC Member Representative Seat

I support Don Stiles for Nome's NSEDC Member Representative Seat.

Don Stiles is an active member of the board and productive voice for Nome and the Norton Sound Region. His formula for success on a large board like NSEDC's has been a combination of leadership, cooperation, altruism, and common sense mixed together to achieve results - and it has worked. He's led the charge to improve our scholarship programs, fishing opportunities, expansion of infrastructure, and much more. A look at his record of achievements as Nome's representative demonstrates that he gets things done. You don't get this without a team approach, and Nome won't get this without Don Stiles. Please join me in supporting Don Stiles.

a hat, and concentrate enforcement for cleanup, abandoned cars, abatement of shacks and violations of building codes

"Issues need to be addressed. We can start with taking small bites of the elephant," Commissioner Randy Romenesko said.

The planning commission has been looking, as has the Nome Common Council, for ways to put teeth in City codes that are being ignored. Both are considering to give the public works director and building inspector the power to issue citations and assess fines to abate violations of building permits, moving permits, fill permits and zoning violations.

The Nome Common Council on Monday adopted an ordinance to allow traffic fines and forfeitures to flow into the City's treasury. The commission agreed with the measure and voiced a desire to look at adding the building codes to the violations.

"We could make it hurt a little bit but not take them to the cleaners," Sparks said.

"It has to be enough to get their attention," Commissioner Charlie Weiss added.

In other business the commission learned that Nome Eskimo Community has withdrawn a variance request for 300 McLain Lane where the housing department wished to build a new home for Della Walluk. The small lot presents setback issues and encroachment into the platted utility easement. Nome Joint Utility System did not approve the encroachment for safety rea-

"While it appears there would be 10-12-foot clearance between the primary power wire and the roof, communications utilities are also permitted on the power poles and there would be significantly less clearance," wrote John Handeland, NJUS manager. "In the event of a fire, if the burning structure was directly underneath high voltage lines, flames would more likely impact the utilities and endanger fire fighters."

NEC will go back to the drawing board to find another solution.

Port panel mulls upgrades

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Port Commission is continuing to plan and implement upgrades on existing facilities at Port of Nome.

The panel held a meeting Sept. 20 to discuss construction plans for a middle dock to fit $10 million in funding that could come from a general obligation bond for ports to come before voters statewide this fall. The commission is debating whether to go ahead with one or two phase plans based on current information. Redrawing plans for a twophase construction would incur $30,000 in additional design costs.

Breaking the construction into two parts would enable work to get underway on the first portion of the dock next summer to provide 200 feet of additional sorely needed docking space.

"I'm just drowning in engineering fees," Joy Baker, harbormaster, told the commissioners.

The port might get money for the first half and not for the second half. Building a first section would yield useable product, commissioners said.

The commissioners decided to table the issue until the outcome of the November election and begin a search for additional funds through the Legislature.

Baker reported that August port traffic volume exceeded all August traffic records since the beginning of port operations, with September and October still to go this season. Northland Services still had considerable cargo to deliver to villages, Baker said. Northland and Alaska Logistics would have barges coming in and Bonanza was expecting the final shipment of petroleum products this week with Vitus Marine.

Baker reported to the commission that a high-mast lighting project was near completion. Nome Joint Utilities had finished work on the causeway and looking to finish tie in work last week with the lights to turn on soon to meet the impending winter darkness.

Baker gave an update on the issue with port user Mike Benchoff's 70ft. tugboat Rustler. Benchoff still had not satisfied a demand that he obtains liability insurance to satisfy the port tariff requirement. Baker began to impose a $300 per day fine on Sept. 15.

A check with Benchoff revealed that a surveyor had come to inspect the boat, but he had not received an insurance binder.

Arctic Policy Commission

at the table to voice concerns and to be part of the collaboration and consultation with the creation of a management regime of the Straits and monitoring - environmental and bio-

Other commissioners are Senator Bert Stedman of Sitka, Senator Lyman Hoffman of Bethel, Senator Cathy Giessel of Anchorage, House Representatives Alan Austerman of Kodiak, Bob Herron of Bethel and Beth Kerttula of Juneau. In addition the legislators, the House Joint Resolution that created the Arctic Policy commission specified that 14 seats are to represent a wide spectrum of interests. Pat Pourchon was appointed to fill the seat for federal government representative. Reggie Joule is to fill the seat for a tribal entity. Stephen Trimble is a mining representative, Lisa Pekich with ConocoPhilipps represents the oil and gas industry. Stephanie Madsen, executive director of the At-Sea Processors Association holds the seat for a fisheries representative. Unalaska City Manager Chris Hladick is the local government representative. Institute of the North managing director Nils Andreassen was appointed to the seat of an International Arctic organization. Layla Hughes is a conservation group representative, Steve Scalzo is the marine transportation and logistics representative, Elizabeth Moore with NANA is the ANCSA corporation representative and Peter Garay who was the American marine pilot on the Russian tanker Renda during her midwinter journey to Nome last year, is the marine pilots representative. Alternates include Senator Donny Olson of Nome and Rep. Bryce Edgmon of Dillingham.

The United States does have an official written Arctic Policy, but the state that makes the US an arctic nation does not. Most of the other Arctic Nations and the Northwest Territories already have established Arctic policies. The reasoning behind the creation of the Arctic Policy commission was that Alaska needs to position itself as a leader regarding the nation's Arctic policy and that Alaska cannot take that leadership role without understanding what its own priorities should be.

The other Arctic nations are anticipating the development of northern shipping routes, mineral extraction, oil and gas exploration, commercial fisheries and tourism to increase. Some of this change has already started to occur and this summer saw the first ever exploration for oil and gas in the Alaskan offshore waters by Shell.

The development of an Alaska Arctic Policy is deemed crucial because the United States will be chairing the Arctic Council from 2015-2017. The Arctic Policy Commission is supposed to be the tool for the Legislature to remain engaged in the ongoing Arctic dialogue and to help shape an Alaskan Arctic policy.

Meeting dates have not been set. but the commission is slated to meet in Arctic areas, Anchorage and Fairbanks over the next two years. The commission is to submit preliminary policy recommendations by January 30, 2014 and a final report by Jan. 30, 2015.

If you fund a School District for iPads

By Lori Head

"This really happened over the summer," explained Robin Johnson, Technology Director of Nome Public Schools (NPS). The Native Village of Council partnered with NPS on a three-year library literacy grant to provide kids with more books. Then the City of Nome added another $40K and the iPads were ordered

What ensued might be likened to the 1985 children's story, "If You Give a Mouse a Cookie," because, according to the story, once a mouse is given a cookie he is going to want some milk. In the case of iPads, the "milk" was making sure NPS had the infrastructure to support the iPads. The wireless network was replaced two years ago at Beltz and just this summer at Nome Elementary.

Once the mouse has the milk, he might ask for a straw. Where should the iPads go? It was decided NPS would be one of the first school districts in Alaska to go 1:1 with the junior high students committing 90 of the iPads. The remaining 110 iPads would be shared by Elementary and Preschool (Head Start) students. Another 25 iPads would be used by instructors.

After finishing the milk, the mouse will ask for a napkin. In iPad terms, this was asking the teachers to come back to school, without being a part of the decision over the summer, and embracing the extra time and work involved learning about the iPads, and then seeking methods and applications to integrate the technology in the classroom. Johnson has been impressed with the teachers' willingness to accept this additional work. During a recent training, the instructor, who was not from the area, commented that Nome teachers were enthusiastic and technologically savvy, according to Johnson.

After using the napkin, the mouse will probably look in the mirror and see if he has a milk mustache. NPS's first look in the mirror probably came during the Junior High Back to School Night, which was well attended by students, parents, grandgaged and eager to share what they had learned from an Apple Trainer who had spent time teaching them about their new iPads.

Robin Johnson has been with the district for 22 years - 12 years with technology. She describes herself as the "big picture" person in the department. System Administrator Jacob Phillips is the "makes it work" person who "speaks the language" and understands, supports and maintains the innards of computers, systems and networks. Justin Heinrich, Integration, brings it to the classroom, helping teachers and students put all the pieces together and modeling how it works. Johnson has the utmost respect and appreciation for both Phillips and Heinrich, summing it up with, "They're incredible." Collectively, their job is accomplished so quietly, in the background, that students and staff may not notice all the technology in the buildings - at least while it is running well.

The iPads each come with a dictionary, camera and calculator, among other tools. Johnson explained that a teacher can direct stuto sites, like, www. gutenberg.org, where they can download free eBooks into their virtual, brown bookshelves, and then flip through the book's pages, reading, highlighting, taking notes or clicking words to hear pronunciations or see definitions.

Also installed on the iPads is an application called GarageBand. Students can record themselves reading a paragraph or page with this application, and then read it again. Each reading is measured by a bar, or 'speaking bubble," according to the length of time and volume, showing readers when they are loud, quiet or pausing. The student can then compare the bars and if the second bar (from the second reading) is shorter than the first reading bar, and/or has fewer breaks from pauses in reading, it is an immediate, visual measurement of improved reading fluency.

Junior High students have also been working with QR codes. These are two-dimensional bar codes that look like squares of black and white designs. However, to the trained, iPad-familiar student they contain information such as the daily assignment or a website address after it is scanned. The teacher can generate these QR codes easily with a free application installed on their iPad.

Presentations can also be projected via iPad to the front of the class. Teachers have the ability to walk around the class, interacting, and then transfer control to students, who can show their work to all the class via their iPad. Students can also share a Keynote presentation, Apple's version of PowerPoint, from their desk or in front of the classroom. Gone are the wasted minutes of waiting during the transitions of student presentations.

Bill Gates once said, "Technology is just a tool. In terms of getting the kids working together and motivating them, the teacher is most important." Add to that a dedicated, highly qualified technology department and Nome Public Schools is on target for technologically literate students – or in other words, if you give a mouse in Nome Public Schools a cookie, he may ask for an iPad!

In their own words: Municipal candidates answer to the public

LOCAL

In order to inform the public of the views of candidates running for office in the upcoming municipal elections on Oct. 2, The Nome Nugget sent out questionnaires to the candidates. This year, there are two seats on the Nome Common Council up of election, two school board seats, two utility board seats and one seat as the Nome representative to the Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation board of directors. All seats are three year terms.

Following are the answers turned in by the candidates.

Nome Common Council Seat "C" Incumbent: Randy Pomeranz

Nome Nugget: Please tell us about your background and why voters should vote for you.

Randy Pomeranz: I have been a resident of Nome for 31 years. All of my children were born and raised in Nome and with Taylor graduating in May, they will all be alumni of Nome-Beltz High School. I have served on the Council for the past 12 years and currently own and operate two local businesses. I have always been a strong supporter of keeping local property taxes down and providing opportunities for our local youth.

NN: What is your motivation to run for public office and what are your priorities that guide your decisions as a council member?

RP: My motivation for running is to try and keep our community an affordable place to live. With the high costs of everything we are seeing residents move to the bigger cities to get relief. They all say the same thing, that they can't afford to live here. In making my decisions on the Council, we always have to keep in mind what is best for the community. You have to put aside personal issues and use an open mind on how you base your vote. There are a lot of times when you need the public's input to make that final choice on some items that are brought to the table. We, as elected officials, are put there by the public and are serving their wants and needs.

Randy Pomeranz

NN: Which priorities should the City pursue?

RP: The city needs to keep pushing for cheaper energy costs for the residents of Nome. We need to also keep our infrastructure up to date and our schools funded properly. If we can cut our energy costs, it will make the other part of the City's responsibilities much easier to accomplish. One thing that will play a big part in this is extending our port out to minus 35 ft. so that we are able to bring in large fuel tankers for fuel deliveries. In one of our recent work sessions a comment was made that we could cut our cost of fuel by a lot if we were able to take delivery by ship versus barge. That, along with having the ability to dock larger vessels, would help Nome on many other issues.

NN: What is your vision for the City of Nome and the Port of Nome to deal with the increasing pressure from the oil and gas industry as well as the shipping industry that take advantage of the increasingly icefree Arctic in the summer?

RP: My vision for the increased activity that is happening offshore would be to extend our port to the minus 35 ft. depth and use it as a major docking for the ships that are going right by us now. Nome could be a major harbor for all the offshore activity that is going on to the north of us. We are already looking at purchasing land to increase the size of the port pad so that we can accommodate these large companies that are drilling for oil. The port has so many opportunities at this time and all we need is to get it to deeper water.

Challenger: Randy Oles

Randy Oles

Nome Nugget: Please tell us about your background and why voters should vote for you.

Randy Oles: I am a long-time resident of Nome and a 33-year member with the Nome Volunteer Fire Department and NVFD Search & Rescue. I am a member of Nome CAP, an Army Veteran and a small business owner. I'm employed with the State of Alaska Dept. of Transportation/SEF.

NN: What is your motivation to run for public office and what are your priorities that guide your decisions as a council member?

The hills outside of Nome show white caps and snow was flying in lower elevations, very briefly covering the vivid fall colors of bright yellow and reds on the tundra. Port of Nome activities slowed down a tad, but that doesn't mean that the shorter days are less hectic. Nome Harbormaster Joy Baker reports that research boat Professor Khromov left the Nome port for the last time this summer on Monday. This week saw six landing craft coming through Nome. Two construction equipment barges arrived with one delivering equipment to overwinter in Nome and the other one is supposed to take on construction equipment to haul it out of Nome. An Alaska Logistics barge arrived on Wednesday with the special dynamic compaction crane that Twin Peaks was waiting for as they need the crane for the Airport runway dip emergency repair project. The crane, too heavy to be trucked over the existing Snake River bridge, was put on a truck, then unloaded and walked across the river after special permits were secured, and taken to the construction site via the long way past the tank farms, the sewage lagoon, Dredge 6 and to the airport runway.

Baker also reports that four sail-boats that recently completed the Northwest Passage anchor at port facilities. One is anchored at the causeway, the other three inside the harbor. Yet to arrive in Nome before the port closes for the season is a fuel delivery, the two last mainline barges – one Alaska Logistics, one Northland Services – and one last research boat to accompany the Polar Prince, the Canadian icebreaker still anchored out at sea in front of Nome.

In the office, Baker will see a change come on Friday as Port of Nome office assistant Tim Shield is leaving the job and Nome after many, many years to join his family in Kenai.

familiar with local city government regulations (Title 29) and processes. My experience in dealing with federal and state agencies will be a valuable asset for the community of Nome.

NN: What is your motivation to run for public office and what are your priorities that guide your decisions as a council member?

KH: I have been asked to run for city council by members of the mining and business community to bring my experience to the council as a voting member. Recent council decisions seem to have an anti-mining/business slant in many folks' mind. I hope to be a voice on the council that will represent small businesses and the challenges they face in dealing with seemingly monolithic bureaucracies and the regulations that seem to pop up willnilly in response to their activites. I think the sales tax puts our local merchants at a disadvantage and would like to explore other funding options for the city and it's services. I am a fiscal conservative who believes people should basically be responsible for themselves and their actions. I would rather work for and support ideas and projects I believe in than to fight against those I do not.

NN: Which priorities should the City pursue?

KH: One of the first priorities I would emphasize is communications with the public. For instance the last posting of council information to the City website is several months old. How do I as an interested person stay informed of what's coming before the council or research what's been going on? The Nome Nugget articles are fine, but don't go into all the details, and that's coverage after the fact, not beforehand. Port development, energy options, water/sewer services, and infrastructure improvements are priorities that directly impact business and quality of life issues and need to be pursued. Other projects I would really like to see come to fruition is a large multi-use facility such as Mitch Erikson has proposed that could be a hockey rink as well as a performing arts center. The number of children that show up at the hockey rink whenever it's cleared show the tremendous impact of a wintertime alternative activity. The Front Street beautification plan the Chamber of Commerce is developing is also a great idea that needs to happen to assist tourism development. I think that we need to become less dependent on government dollars and more diversified in our economy, taking advantage of the increased shipping and tourist interest in our region as best we can, while supporting current industrial activity such as gold and gravel mining.

NN: What is your vision for the City of Nome and the Port of Nome to deal with the increasing pressure from the oil and gas industry as well as the shipping industry that take advantage of the increasingly icefree Arctic in the summer?

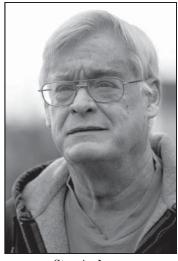

KH: My vision for the City and Port of Nome to deal with increasing OPPORTUNITY is to take as much advantage of it as possible. We should do whatever we can to assist locally based businesses in meeting the opportunities to service the needs of industry as the development and use of the Arctic region continues to unfold. Public-private partnerships and joint ventures to complete goals otherwise unobtainable should be pursued aggressively yet cautiously with an ear to the political winds of change.

Nome Common Council Seat "D" Incumbent: Stan Andersen

Nome Nugget: Please tell us about your background and why voters should vote for you.

Stan Andersen: I was born and raised in Nome. I have served on the Nome Common Council, Utility

Board and Planning Commission for several years. I take the time to study the material for a more informed decision.

Stan Andersen

NN: What is your motivation to run for public office and what are your priorities that guide your decisions as a council member?

SA: I have always had a desire to be a part of the direction the City is heading, which includes the Utilities and School. I want to make the public aware of where our money comes from and where it's being spent.

NN: Which priorities should the City pursue?

SA: Priorities would be continued road improvements, a solid school system, measured port improvements and a safe city. With the shortfall of funds from the Federal Government, more organizations will look to the City for funding. The State has to – in the next couple of years – cut back on funding also.

NN:What is your vision for the City of Nome and the Port of Nome to deal with the increasing pressure from the oil and gas industry as well as the shipping industry that take advantage of the increasingly icefree Arctic in the summer?

SA: I support building up our existing Port while looking for money to expand to deeper water and our shore facilities need to be expanded.

Challenger: Nikolai A. Ivanoff

Nikolai Ivanoff

Nome Nugget: Please tell us about your background and why voters should vote for you.

Nikolai Ivanoff: I was born on November 7, 1950 in Russia. I am a U.S. citizen now, I have Master Degree in Geology and over 35 years experience working for exploration and mining companies. My family includes wife Svetlana, son Igor, daughter Lucy and their spouses, and four grandchildren. My son lives with his family in Japan and my daughter lives in Anchorage where she teaches Japanese and Russian in High School. She recently graduated from UAA with a Master degree in Education

In 1993 I moved to Nome. Since 1996 I have been employed by the Alaska Gold Company (AGC), which was then owned by Mueller Industrial until 1998. NovaGold Resources Inc. is the present owner.

It was and still is a pleasure for me to work for AGC and to help with community development of many subdivisions, as well as leasing and selling land for storage and for placer mining activities.

The AGC land manager position requires to communicate and deal with many Nome residents. With NovaGold official's advice and help, I always try to honorably and respectfully serve customers and to try to find the best solution, making sure it works out for AGC and Nome residents.

So far this relationship was very successful and I am sure people and city officials will remember what was done for the community by NovaGold/AGC and me as the land manager.

So! For many years I have been working for AGC owners and the community out of the AGC office and now I try also to work for the community as a member of the Nome Common Council.

The past few years has seen the gold rush/gold fever returning to the Nome area, but we are not ready for this and we also do not have a mining expert sitting on the Nome Common Council who would represent the mining community. This is one of the main reasons why I have submitted my name to be one of your city council members.

Also we need a fresh view on many issues that we are facing in Nome and I want to present to the Nome community some my ideas, if elected

Let's vote for me and give me a chance to make some positive changes in our community life!

NN: What is your motivation to run for public office and what are your priorities that guide your decisions as a council member?

NI: First off, I am not running to satisfy my own ambition or get some benefits for myself or a special group of people. I'll be working for all members of community, even those who do not vote for me. This will be a challenging job and I will be ready to serve the community with honor and respect. I am a very strong, welleducated person with fresh views on some of Nome's problems and wish to help us move forward. While the town site was created in 1905, we are living in the 21st century and need to adapt. We need to define a clear path forward in which Nome can grow and prosper. Also we need to prepare the City and its facilities for the upcoming expansion in arctic resource development that is just around the corner. So! In order to do this, we need to elect people who can quickly adapt a new, 21st century reality. I hope I have the chance of doing this after I am elected as a member of Nome Common Council.

NN: Which priorities should the City pursue?

NI: At any level of government, elected officials have to present to the public a community strategic plan, because without solid plans and approval by the people, a lot can be done wrong.

I want introduce my vision and what needs to be done in the near as well as distant future in Nome to make sure our community will "fit" into the 21st century's reality.

In order for Nome to be a better place to live and create a strong economy, we cannot depend only on federal and state dollars.

We need help from all Alaska elected officials in Washington, DC and the state to make sure that Nome will be selected to be a regional Western Alaska marine/aviation hub for the upcoming Arctic region resource development. It will be great for the Nome community and also for all of Western Alaska.

I support exploration and developing mineral resources in Nome area (including natural gas near Nome) and Seward Peninsula, because the mining industry provides high pay jobs and also helps surrounding communities. Modern mining technologies and strong state regulations make the mining industry more controllable and harmless for nature and we do not have to be overly concerned about the impact.

I think we need to continue to bring serious attention to alternative energy and electricity sources, including wind powering generators and also Pilgrim Hot Spring hot water resources and of course natural gas.

City officials, council members and the community have to decide which way Nome wants to grow and what we can do about small lots and old, unoccupied buildings located on Front Street and on many streets in town. I'm sure everybody wants to see our beautiful town to be much cleaner and attractive for visitors and Nome residents.

If the community is united, and if city and elected officials do their job and follow promises, then everything can be done and our community Nome will be a great place to live and our economy would become stronger, and more important, stable.

NN: What is your vision for the City of Nome and the Port of Nome to deal with the increasing pressure from the oil and gas industry as well as the shipping industry that advantage of the increasingly ice-free Arctic in the summer?

NI: First we need figure who exactly (Coast Guard, the military, oil industry or construction companies) would be stationed or set up a base here in Western Alaska and specifically in Nome.

Then we need to start to research what option Nome has, whether it be a deep water port, inland storage space, housing, workforce and much more. Without solid information and promises of a future port facility, or housing and storage space users, we can't go forward and spend money for all upgrading infrastructures.

So! City and elected officials need to spend energy, money and time to promote Nome make sure our port and all facilities will be selected for long term use for all activity in the Arctic.

We have few competitors. There are other places in Western Alaska vie for dollars to develop a deep draft port and also to set up bases for future Arctic development and we need to be working hard make sure Nome will be selected.

Challenger: Jim West Jr.

Nome Nugget: Please tell us about your background and why voters should vote for you.

Jim West Jr.

Jim West Jr.: Born and raised in Nome, have a Degree in Business Administration, own and operate various businesses here in Nome, 28 year member of the Nome Volunteer Fire and Search & Rescue Dept currently a Captain, 6 year member of the Nome Ambulance Dept., 10 plus years as a member of the Local Emergency Planning Commission, past member of the Nome Joint Utilities Board, 12 years and current chairman of the Nome Port Commission. I have been involved with and completed projects which include building the Port of Nome Phase 1 and Phase 2, building the new Power Plant, the continuing phases of upgrades on the water and sewer system, the new Public Safety and equipment storage buildings and the new landfill solid waste cell. Preparing and growing Nome's future for the benefit of the younger generation thru responsible, fiscal management. Nome is a First Class city with outstanding city services that the people have come to enjoy. We have been very lucky on being able to find the grant funding to help with the much-needed upgrades throughout the city, utility and school systems.

NN: What is your motivation to run for public office and what are your priorities that guide your decisions as a council member?

JW: My motivation for running for office is very simple, to ensure the citizens of Nome are well represented and have a say in all issues that come up. Having a good ear to listen to the concerns of the people and the ability to strive for positive actions for the good of all its citizens is a priority for me. With my background I will bring to the council table a positive outlook on the present and future needs of the city. Keeping the balance of harmony between taxes, school education, future development needs will be a priority in my book and having a good understanding of how things are put together. We are all in this together there is no I in team, positive actions gives positive results.

NN: Which priorities should the City pursue?

JW: A.) The City of Nome has been very lucky in the past ten years to be on the receiving end of Federal dollars. With the political climate up in the air, we face the possibilities not being so fortunate, we now have to stay within our means and enjoy continued on page 9 what we have built. With this funding we have upgraded our infrastructure, which we dearly needed and have to maintain the services which all of Nome citizens have come accustom to.

B.) The City of Nome does and will continue supporting the Education system. Finding the balance is challenging, but it must be done for we are growing the future of Nome.

C.) With the coming of global warming, the shipping lanes will be opened up more, making Nome a natural stop-over point. We have seen over the past few years more activity out on the Bering Sea and our Port has seen an increased use. We need to increase the length to get to a deeper depth to accommodate the larger vessels. This potentially would help in lowering the freight cost to the people of Nome along with helping the economy by providing more local jobs. Nome is lucky to have two Ports that could be developed, in town and out at Cape Nome. In my opinion, the development of Cape Nome, which is naturally deep but without protection, would be my first choice. This would push potential development out towards Cape Nome or adding to the existing causeway would be a little more expensive, but the result would be the

NN: What is your vision for the City of Nome and the Port of Nome to deal with the increasing pressure from the oil and gas industry as well as the shipping industry that take advantage of the increasingly icefree Arctic in the summer?

JW: We all need to keep an open mind and ear to the future development of Nome. We are in good position to deal with any and all activities that might pass through our community. Nome has a good infrastructure, airport and road system to handle the traffic that might come our way. Nome has in the past always been a good stopping point for fuel, cargo, and will always be a good place to stop. There's No Place Like Nome. With the increasingly ice-free Arctic, Nome is a natural spot to conduct a good support center for any and all traffic. Being able to provide goods and services to these folks will only help the Nome community to grow in the long run. Balancing the needs through smart fiscal responsibility will help keep the quality of life we all enjoy here in Nome. I would like to encourage everyone to get out and exercise your right to vote. Thank you and I would appreciate your support on Election Day.

Incumbent: Betsy Brennan

Nome Nugget: Please tell us about your background and what your qualifications are to be on the NPS school board.

Betsy Brennan: My name is Betsy Brennan and I am the incumbent candidate running for Nome School Board Seat C. I have lived in Nome since 1988. I earned my Bachelor's of Science degree in Environmental Science from Saint Michael College prior to moving to Nome. My husband, Mike Wade and I have been married since 1998. I am the proud mother of John and Sarah, ages 12 and 9. They both attend Nome Public Schools. I work full time in the business office of KNOM Radio Sta-

During the 24 years I have lived in Nome, I have served on various local boards and organizations: Nome Preschool Association Board of Directors, The Bering Sea Woman's Group Board of Directors, St. Joseph Catholic Church Parish Council, Nome Community Center Board, and the Nome Parent Teacher Student Association. I have served as an elected member of the Nome Public School Board for five years. I feel passionately that education is the key to success in life for all children. Being a member of the Nome School Board is another way for me to be involved in the community I love and use my talents to do good things for kids. I have the experience and proven commitment to serve as a school board member.

NN: With huge reading deficits in the Nome Public School District (many 8th grade students are reading at the second and third grade level) what would you as a school board member do to help solve the problem?

BB: I believe as a current school board member, I AM supporting our Nome Public Schools staff in working on the problem of students not being able to read at their grade level. It is a problem that no one is running away from. As a board member I have attended training and listened to education experts and brought home ideas to my School District. I have advocated for school budgets that include funding for programs that will directly impact student learning. Nome Public Schools has dedicated teachers and staff that work hard every day for our students. As a board member, I have supported adding more teachers to our staff to keep the student to teacher ratio at or below 20 to 1.

I have supported the following efforts as a current board member: NPS was awarded a grant to hire three certified teachers to work with Nome Preschool and Kawerak Headstart to increase school readiness. The Nome Elementary School staff is in the second year of implementing the "Read 90" initiative. This "Read 90" aims to have all students reading at grade level by the time they reach 3rd grade. Staff is doing this through a variety of literacy interventions and more time is being spent teaching reading. A program called Reading Mastery is being used to teach students that are reading below grade level. NPS added a transitional class to the 1st grade with a focus on catch up growth in reading. The school has partnered with various community organizations like Nome Eskimo Community, Nome PTSA, and Nome City Library to have programs such as "Guys Read", "Girls Read" and a fall and spring reading incentive gram. In the Junior High, a "one to one" iPad initiative has begun with generous support from the Native Village of Council and the City of Nome. NPS added a third Junior High English/Language Arts teacher for this school year. Can more be done? Absolutely! I believe more parent and school communication needs to occur on this subject. I believe NPS is making a great effort to help solve this problem.

NN: Describe your vision to realize a quality education for the diverse student populations in Nome?

BB: The Nome Public Schools vision statement states: Nome Students will be engaged in a quality education that ensures student proficiency through a challenging curriculum that embraces diversity and is culturally responsive. As a board member I have a duty to follow this vision. Our job in public education is to take ALL children that come to us and help them grow, learn and develop so when they leave our district they have the tools to be successful in whatever they choose to do in life. I take every opportunity to learn and ask questions of our administration, staff and community when there are important decisions before the board. When making decisions, I will try to always ask the question - Is this good for our kids? I always have an open door policy for public input.

NN: What are your financial priorities for the school district?

BB: My first priority as a school board member is to advocate for the education of the youth in our community. The outcome of public education is important to everyone's future. Therefore, my greatest financial priority is to advocate for funding for Nome Public Schools on the local, State and Federal level. I have shown support for our children by asking the Governor and Alaska State Legislature for an increase in funding for public education in Alaska. I will continue to do so. I believe our students are well worth this investment. I attend budget meetings with the Nome Common Council to advocate for City of Nome funding for our schools. In the upcoming year I intend to once again ask for funding to keep student to teacher ratios at or below 20 to 1. I believe it is vital to continue to fund the Nome Public Schools pre-Kindergarten staff. We have seen large gains in the readiness of our students to enter school. The District needs to retain the excellent staff we now have, and recruit new staff when we do have turnover. We need to offer fair wages to our employees so NPS can compete with school districts in areas with a lower cost of living.

NN: With huge reading deficits in the Nome Public School District (many 8th grade students are reading at the second and third grade level) what would you as a school board member do to help solve the problem?

MR: As a school board member, I will support and make sure that the School Board is evaluating the outcome of Read90 and current curriculum. The board needs to stay current with reading assessments and proficiency scores for Nome Public Schools. I would like to encourage parents to read more at home, volunteer to read in classrooms at their school and ask questions about their child's reading level. I would also support a reading program between schools and local agencies that are offering tutoring to students.

NN: Describe your vision to realize a quality education for the diverse student populations in Nome?

MR: If elected to the School Board, I would like to make sure that all Nome students are competitive in academics, scholarships, college prep, Alaska performance scholarship and support reading and math fundamentals. There is so much support in Nome, our region, and Alaska for higher education that I would like to see all our students prepared and make sure everyone of them is offered the best education to be suc-

NN: What are your financial priorities for the school district?

MR: I think that the top priority for funding should be to support all aspects of student experience in the school system. This means academics first. It also includes school environment (classroom, lunchroom, transportation) and any needed additional training for teachers. Support staff (cooks, custodial and maintenance) should also receive annual or updated training — this helps operations of schools run smoothly and has a great affect on students and their surroundings. I support spending extra for academic activities to help in reading, math, language and Native culture classes and culture awareness. I'm not afraid to ask questions and receive input from the

Beltz Cross Country runners sweep Region 1 North

By Tara Schmidt

Nome's top seven boys and girls cross country runners will be advancing to the State Championships this weekend at Bartlett High School in Anchorage after their doubleheader victory in Unalakleet.

The varsity girl's team dominated the podium, with five scorers finishing in the top 15 for a team score of 26. Second place was Barrow with 42 points.

Led by Rosa Schmidt (19:05), Senora Ahmasuk (19:48), and Hannah Tozier (20:23) in first, second, and third places once again, the Lady Nanooks remain undefeated this season. Tori Thomas' fifth place finish was instrumental to their low score, solidified by Jannelle Trowbridge in 15th position. Teammate Alexis Hutson set a personal record time of 26:17, coming in 22nd place.

Many of the racers last weekend posted personal records, as the Unalakleet course was largely downhill. White Mountain senior Asa Bergamaschi had shattered the competition on the very same course at the Wolfpack Invitational two weeks previ-

Bergamaschi led half the Regional race, pulling ahead as they turned onto the rutted, rough and slippery half-mile loop through the tundra. Tim Schmidt passed Bergamaschi after the course turned back onto the road pointing downhill. Schmidt completed the race in 16:23, with Bergamaschi 30 seconds behind.

Following racers from Kotzebue, White Mountain, Barrow, Kiana, and St. Michael, the next Nanook to cross the finish line was James Horner in 9th place, in 18:09. Nome's remaining scorers arrived in 12th, 14th, and 15th. They were Lief Erikson, Junyor Erikson, and James Jorgensen, respectively. Nick Morgan and Degnan Lawrence were close behind, finishing 18th and Eighth-grade runner Ivory Okleasik took another first-place title for the Nanooks as the fastest in the Junior High Girls division. Her time of 22:21 would have placed her in seventh amid the high school girls.

Three Junior Varsity representatives competed in the open race, with Bobby Pate (18:36) placing third overall and the first high school student to finish. Nolan Horner sprinted into the chute in fourth position (19:11) but second for high school, and Oliver Hoogendorn placed fourth among JV; seventh overall.

Coach Jeff Collins said, "One of the key points this season is the depth of our boys team. This is the first season we've been able to set people aside if they're sick.'

Speaking about the team, he added, "I'm very pleased with the they present themselves. I couldn't be happier with how they've grown up as people, competitors, and a team.'

Before the season wraps up, the Nanooks have one last race to run, and Collins says, this is the zenith of the season. "Our big focus is Regional's and State. Long term goals supersede the short term, and the short term leads to the long term," Collins said.

Volleyball Ladies win bracket in thrilling weekend

The undefeated Lady Nanooks volleyball squad had yet to face any sort of challenge from an opponent this season, but all of that changed last weekend in Anchorage. The ladies were able to win their bracket in the West Anchorage High School tournament, defeating teams from 3A and 4A schools on the way in thrilling fashion, but also lost some matches.

The ladies arrived to the tournament last Thursday preparing first for pool play matches on Friday, where they would be assigned a bracket depending on the results. Each match was only two sets long, but the ladies played four different matches on Friday to qualify. In the first match, Eagle River defeated Nome, 25-18 and 25-19 followed by a split set match with Skyview where Nome took the first set, 25-16 and Skyview

In the third match against South High, one of the best 4A schools in the state, Nome played competitively but eventually fell, 26-24 and 25-16. And in the final match of the day, the Nanooks fell again, losing 25-18, 25-14. With Nome having just won one out of the eight total sets in qualifying, they were assigned to the nickel bracket, one of four brackets in the tournament.

The Nanooks, who had not been truly tested yet this season, got all they could handle and more in the qualifying rounds. These losses could have demoralized the team heading into the bracket, but rather, they seemed to make the team hungry and stronger instead.

The bracket began the next day, Saturday, where the ladies' first match came courtesy of Homer. The first set was competitive throughout, but in the end Homer came out on top, 25-23. Being down a set in a best of three set format could have marked trouble for the Nanooks. But once again, the ladies did not panic or get discouraged, but rather bounced back with force, winning the second set, 25-16. In the third and deciding set, Nome was able to win it 15-11, outlasting Homer in the

The win was just the beginning of the madness for the ladies in this bracket because in the very next match, Nome faced off against Thunder Mountain. In this match, it was eerily similar to the first match, only this time the ladies reversed the script, winning the first set, 25-23. However, in the second set, the ladies could not close it out, dropping the second set, 25-20. And in the third and deciding set yet again, Nome prevailed, winning this time

15-12. With this match being very similar to the first, it showed that the Nanook ladies seemed to play better after dropping a set, having won a set both times after dropping a previous

With the two wins, the ladies moved on to the championship game of the bracket where they faced Wasilla. With Nome having played nearly six matches in a span of 24 hours, the question heading into the championship was if the ladies had enough energy left in the tank. In the match, they answered the questions, winning it in two very competitive sets, 25-22 and 25-23.

The win was huge, not only for their confidence but also to answer a lot of the questions swirling around about the team. The question heading into this tournament was how they would stack up physically and mentally against stronger competition. The ladies, who have been saying all season that they would be ready for stiffer competition came out and proved it. Perhaps the thing to take away from this last weekend's result was not just that they won their bracket, but rather the mental toughness they showed to win it, bouncing back time after time from adversity.

"Overall, we played well. I was very pleased," said Lucas Frost, head coach of the Lady Nanooks commenting about the weekend as a whole. Coach Frost will not be the only one impressed after this weekend with the ladies showing that they can compete with anyone. The ladies, coming off their biggest matches and wins of the season, look to build off them when they head to Homer for another big tournament this upcoming weekend.

Arctic Orchestra delights Nome audience

Story and Photos by Diana Haecker

A rare treat came to Nome courtesy of the Nome Arts Council in form of the 30-member Arctic Chamber Orchestra that performed at the Nome Elementary School's gym on Saturday evening.

The orchestra, an offshoot of the Fairbanks Symphony Orchestra, toured Alaska with stops in Healy, Wasilla, Eagle River, Anchorage and, for a grand finale, in Nome.

Nome Arts Council president Josie Stiles said that the orchestra approached the NAC if they wanted to host the orchestra in exchange for a hot meal and a performance fee. The Arts Council jumped at the opportunity since it has been at least two decades since the orchestra has been in Nome to perform, and treated the musicians to a king crab dinner and berry desserts. In turn, the Nome audience experienced an evening not soon to be forgotten.

with the Arctic Chamber Orchestra in Nome. Watabe was born in Japan, holds a doctorate from the University of Northern Colorado and joined the music faculty at UAF in 2009.

MAESTRO- Russian born Maestro Eduard Zilberkant, right, is the musical director and conductor of the Fairbanks Symphony Orchestra and the Arctic Chamber Orchestra, which performed in Nome last Saturday.

The Arctic Chamber Orchestra drew a crowd of more than 140 Nomeites. Before the concert started, conductor Eduard Zilberkant pointed out viola player Trevor Adams, Nomeite Jimmy Adams' grandson. The orchestra first performed Franz Schubert's Overture in D, in the Italian style, often associated with ballet performances.

Then came an unusual piece composed by Russian composer Alexander Konstantinovich Glazunov (1865-1936), which incorporated a rather modern instrument, the saxophone in its concerto for saxophone and strings. Fairbanks music professor and Japanese born Jun Watabe definitely stole the show with his saxophone performance, also in Ibert's concertino da camera for saxschool athletics and activities. I currently work at the Nome Community Center assisting programs like the Nome Food Bank, Senior Services, Children's services and tobacco prevention programs. I am a proud alumni Nanook, and plan to focus on our children for ALL to succeed from our Nome-Beltz schools. I highly value education as it is a key to success as early as infancy, preschool, and during all Nome Elementary and Jr. / Sr. High years; the education we provide impacts lives and well being.

NN: With huge reading deficits in the Nome Public School District (many 8th grade students are reading at the second and third grade level) what would you as a school board member do to help solve the problem?

PD: This is a tough one because I don't know what programs the school is using to help children learn to read. I think the current curriculum/programs are good. We need to support teacher training, parents in the classroom, support reading as a foundation of education, support the reading initiative and follow up with results, and definitely support teachers/parent input on improving reading skills. We need teaching staff that can connect with students, so that children feel comfortable learning and want to learn. Early literacy begins in preschool and kindergarten. We want involved parents. Parents are children's first teachers and their strongest advocates for learning. If schools don't have relationships with parents, we are losing the battle.

NN: Describe your vision to realize a quality education for the diverse student populations in Nome?

PD: It's wonderful that we have diversity in our schools. We want students to reach their highest potential in school and to do that they need support from staff, peers, parents and community. ALL students need support, ALL of our kids, not just the students who can read well, not just the students with perfect behavior. ALL students need to feel connected and welcomed at school. We can't reach our vision of quality education without reaching all of our students. We need to continue to make reading a priority until all of our students are proficient.

NN: What are your financial priorities for the school district?

PD: Obviously reading is an issue, so efforts need to be made to cover this priority. I encourage the community to give input about financial priorities. When we invest in curriculum, we need to make sure it is working, support K-2 education, which is foundational to the entire education experience. Technology, building maintenance, quality personnel, quality curriculum, extracurricular activities—these are some of the other issues that would benefit from prioritizing as a group/school board together, so we're united in spending money. Please vote for Paula Davis School Board Seat "D"!

NSEDC
Member Representative
Incumbent: Don Stiles

Don Stiles

Nome Nugget: What is your motivation to run for NSEDC office and what are your qualifications to be on the NSEDC board?

Don Stiles: I'd like to continue as a productive team member on NSEDC's board. I have maintained positive working relationships with the NSEDC board of directors and staff and have the ability to communicate effectively and work well with others, which is critical in a large board like NSEDC's. I am an active commercial fisherman who has a long record of involvement in both Nome and the Norton Sound region. I have been a strong advocate for Nome and its needs and have a good sense of what's needed in the region. I feel like I have a good record in my prior service through NSEDC and I would like to continue helping to guide the corporation as it invests in our communities, residents and fisheries.

NN: What is your vision to guide NSEDC as a board member?

DS: I would like to see continued growth in NSEDC's programs. Programs that educate, provide scholarships and support youth activities. Programs that help lower the cost of energy. Programs that will enhance and rehabilitate our fisheries through responsible methods.

NSEDC has made progress in all these areas, but there is still work to do. I would like to see NSEDC continue to expand commercial fishing opportunities in the region. Our recent expanded winter crab fishery this year was a great success. Giving residents more opportunities to earn income through activities like commercial fishing is one of the best ways we can encourage economic development. I would also like to see more programs and opportunities in NSEDC member communities outside of Nome. When they do well. Nome does well.

NN: NSEDC's annual financial report for 2011 is due to arrive at every mail box in the member communities by Sept. 30, nine months after last year ended. There is no financial report in the quarterly reports NSEDC sends to its member communities. If you are elected, what will you do to provide Nome residents with timely information about NSEDC's financial activities and status on a quarterly basis?

DS: This question is written in a way that assumes NSEDC is currently and actively working to improperly keep information from residents in our member communities. This is not the case. I think a better question is what is the right balance between disclosure and protection when it comes to financial information. I believe myself and my fellow board members have done a good job finding that balance. As board members we have a duty and fiduciary responsibility to safeguard certain financial information. We also have to make sure what is released is accurate.

Part of this is due to our participation in the competitive commercial fishing industry in the Bering Sea, as well as our relationship with harvesting partners, which are private companies. NSEDC does report on quarterly financial results at it's board meetings which the public and media are invited to attend. The Nugget is often at these meetings and on the quarterly figures. These figures are only preliminary, however. NSEDC does not publish our financial data until it has gone through a rigorous audit performed by an outside firm. This happens after the calendar year has NSEDC is by far the most transparent of the six CDQ groups, and is the only one that allows the public and press to attend its quarterly meetings. NSEDC could hold all financial discussions in private, but this is not something I have pushed for. If people would like more disclosure, I would certainly hear them out. At this point, however, I believe people are satisfied with NSEDC's transparency.

NN: In your view, what is the most effective way for NSEDC to help improve the diminished chum salmon runs in the Nome subdistrict?

DS: The issue of poor chum salmon returns in the Nome subdistrict is complex. Anyone who blames a single cause for the decline in chums is either mistaken or is trying to mislead others. There are many factors involved – overfishing, habitat issues, competition from Asian hatchery chum (that affect the carrying capacity of the oceans), bycatch in the pollock fishery, the Area M salmon fishery, coho predation and numerous others all play a role. Some are significant while others play a much lesser role. A lot of focus gets placed on NSEDC because NSEDC is the only organization actively pursuing salmon restoration efforts on a regional scale—but that doesn't mean we need to be the only ones. Other organizations are working on local projects and NSEDC has a long history of working with other entities. I would encourage more groups to partner with NSEDC in addressing salmon concerns, in Nome and elsewhere.

This question will likely generate discussion of a hatchery at Hobson Creek. NSEDC's past history with this project and its operator's inability to get a hatchery permit makes me unable to support allocating funds to a project that can't move forward.

Even if Hobson Creek were permitted by ADF&G it wouldn't be the magic bullet that solves our chum issues. It is a cold-water stream that stunts salmon growth, putting the fry at a distinct disadvantage as late bloomers. This does not rule out my support for a future hatchery project in the region as part of an overall plan for chum, but I also won't blindly demand that NSEDC fund a non-permitted project with no regard for the critical limitations that come with it. If we are going to put the money forward to operate a hatchery, we should fund one that can be permitted and will be successful.

We've heard a lot about hatcheries from a very few people. If Nome truly wants a hatchery, it needs more support than just a handful of people who have tunnel-vision on only a single option. As a board member I will make sure any project we support will have a realistic chance of getting a permit and that its operators will make every effort to meet permitting requirements.

If a hatchery for chum salmon, or perhaps another species that people feel is more desirable, is truly what Nome wants, then I have the ability to work with NSEDC's board members and staff to make that happen. No single board member can steer NSEDC on their own.

I'm not one to talk much about my accomplishments, but I know the importance of having Nome's representative be able to work well with other members – and my record demonstrates that I get things done. I would appreciate your VOTE Tuesday, October 2, 2012. Thank you.

 Challenger: Louie Green Jr.

Nome Nugget: What is your motivation to run for NSEDC office and what are your qualifications to be on the NSEDC board?

Louie Green Jr.: I have been serving on regional boards and committees since 1993. I want to give member communities a stronger voice in how NSEDC conducts its business. I also want to provide transparency and accountability in NSEDC's business affairs to members of the Nome community. I am the chairman of the Seward Peninsula Federal Subsistence Regional Advisory Council. I serve on the Sitnasuak Native Corporation and Bering Straits Native Corporation boards of directors.

NN: What is your vision to guide NSEDC as a board member?

LG: I want to find a way to provide local people more access to Bering Sea and Aleutian Island commercial fisheries and encourage other means of economic development within the member communities. I feel NSEDC should have a larger role in advocating for and developing local subsistence fishing.

Louie Green Jr.

NN: NSEDC's annual financial report for 2011 is due to arrive at every mail box in the member communities by Sept. 30, nine months after last year ended. There is no financial report in the quarterly reports NSEDC sends to its member communities. If you are elected, what will you do to provide Nome residents with timely information about NSEDC's financial activities and status on a quarterly basis?

LG: The annual report to every box holder should be due on April 15 for the previous year. I would provide quarterly financial reports to each member community's city council following each NSEDC quarterly board meeting. I would also provide a copy of NSEDC's audited financial statement to the member communities.

NN: In your view, what is the most effective way for NSEDC to help improve the diminished chum salmon runs in the Nome subdistrict?

LG: In my view, the best way to improve local chum salmon runs is to work cooperatively with Sitnasuak Native Corporation that owns the land in the Nome Subdistrict where the weakest chum salmon runs occur, to operate the Hobson Creek Hatchery. We should support studies using marked fish from the hatchery to determine the impact of interception in the False Pass commercial salmon fishery on Norton Sound chum salmon runs. We should advocate for a serious reduction in salmon Bycatch in the Pollock trawl fisheries. Marked chum salmon from the hatchery could also contribute to assessing the impact of trawl bycatch on Nome Subdistrict salmon stocks.

Utility board incumbents Fred Moody and Dave Barron run uncontested and did not submit their answers to the Nome Nugget questionnaire.

Saying It Sincerely

By Father Ross Tozzi

Treasure in Heaven

A man ran up to Jesus and asked, 'Good teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" Since the man observed all of the commandments, Jesus asked him to take the next step, "You are lacking in one thing. Go, sell what you have, and give to the poor and you will have treasure in heaven; then come, follow me." The man eager to ask Jesus the question was not so eager to accept the answer and went away sad.

The husband of one wealthy family in France was a watch maker and his wife owned a business making fine lace. By the standards of the time they were a wealthy family. They were grateful to God and recognized their wealth was a blessing from God for which they were called to be responsible stewards. Without the benefit of a Food Bank like Nome, those who were hungry approached their home directly to ask for assistance. They sent their youngest daughter to the door when people came knocking for assistance. Although only a child, the parents wanted her to recognize the need to help others. She greeted those in need with a warm smile and gave generously from the family's ample supply of food. Part of the key to giving with joy is to recognize that we have a responsibility to help oth-

Illness set in and the mother died of cancer. In time, illness robbed the father of the ability to make a living as a watch maker and yet he still considered himself a rich man. He was rich for he had the love of five daughters. Each of the daughters in turn asked Jesus, "Good teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" The daughters all observed the commandments and from the wealth of faith they received from mother and father, they were all eager to set aside worldly concerns to follow the Lord. Each entered religious life in order to pray for the good of others and to grow closer in their own relationship to God.

The youngest entered religious life at age 15, in fact ahead of several of her sisters. In the Story of a Soul she tells of her life and of her relationship with God. She recognized God's wisdom and asked him to share it generously with her. Although she didn't own a bible, she had access to one in the chapel and memorized verses taking the lessons from scripture to heart. She recognized God's abundant love and asked to be able to share that love as easily and as freely as she had responded to those who asked for food at the front door of the home she grew up in. She recognized the sacrifice of Jesus on the cross and asked to share in that wealth as well. She contracted a fatal disease that medical science did not know how to cure at the time. She died a martyr of love at the age of 24 from tuberculosis. Even in her pain and suffering she still found ways to reach out to others. Through letters that took great effort to write in her illness, she encouraged a young man to give to the poor and follow the Lord to the ends of the earth.

It is good to ponder the question of eternal life often, and to respond generously to others. An elder rich in wisdom does not grow poorer by generously sharing that wisdom with others. A hunter, who shares the wealth of the hunt with those who can no longer hunt, feeds the soul both for himself and for his neighbor. And let us not forget the Little Way of Therese of Lisieux who turned the question around on Jesus and asked him to share abundantly from his wealth so that she could share it with

John Patrick Bunce

John Patrick Bunce, age 26, died Saturday morning, September 1, 2012 at his home in Nome, Alaska.

John Patrick Bunce

John was born November 13, 1985 at 6:27 PM at Emanuel Hospital in Portland, Oregon. His mother is Noqah Elisi Adkins of Homer, Alaska. His birth father, John Patrick Bunce Sr. resides in Oregon. John's early childhood was spent in Estacada, Oregon and when it was time for him to begin school, he and his mother moved to Ashland where he attended pre-school and kindergarten, while his mother worked for the university and attended classes. It was here that John learned to snow ski, swim, ride a bike and many other activities. He was a quiet child, a watcher with keen observation and insatiable curiosity; he had an innate physical strength and agility greater than most, and a wisdom beyond his years; he was, as some would say of him "an old soul." John was ¾ Irish from the Keene family in County Derry, and the Cronan family in County Cork, Ireland and 1/8 Cherokee of the Wolf clan from the Smoky Mountains of North Carolina. He had within him the spiritual awareness and emotional intelligence of his Cherokee ancestors, and the witty charm and keen intellect of his Irish

In 1993 John and his mother moved to Alaska where John attended the Adventist Elementary School in Fairbanks and Nome. He graduated from North Atlantic Regional High School, and Smoky Bay Learning Center at Homer, Alaska in 2004. He did his general college studies at Northeast State College in Tennessee and studied Geology and Diesel Mechanics at University of Alaska Fairbanks. He was certified and licensed through the State of Alaska for Diving, Professional Truck Driving, Hazwoper and Professional Boating Safety. When the issue of his going on to further education was brought up, he would say "I am not disciplined enough to warrant the money it will cost, I think I will wait until I am older." He wanted to study environmental law.

John's first employment was with Tech-Connect in Homer where he learned to install computer systems, and programs. Later in Tennessee, he worked as a lens grinder/polisher for an Optometrist, and laborer for a construction company. In the restaurant that his family owned, John washed dishes, waited tables, tended the till and cleaned. Back in Homer he worked as a deck hand on a fishing boat and learned to make parts and construct yurts for Nomad Shelter. In Nome he worked at leveling buildings; in environmental, as a truck driver, and maintenance/refueler for Nome Gold, general laborer for Nome Utilities, drill sampling for Metal Logeny, and finally for himself as a diver gold dredger. He said to me "mom, I love being down there, it is very peaceful, and there is so much to explore and see...I want to take pictures." For the first time beneath his words there was an exhilaration and wonder as he described what he saw and experienced down there on the ocean floor; he was discovering his passion and coming into his own.

John loved to travel. He visited Mexico, Canada, Costa Rica and Hawaii. At 10 years he rode over 300 miles on horse-back with the Unity of the Nations Riders from the Black Hills of South Dakota, up to Cannon Ball, Alberta. He traveled with his mother in their motor home from Tennessee to Alaska visiting National Parks and historical places along the way. He talked of studying Druidism and going on a Pub Crawl through Ireland; he talked of doing a bike trip through New Zealand, England, and climbing the pyramids of Egypt. He was interested in history, politics, and current events. He read regularly Washington Post and BBC news, and many other sources. His interest in music was widely eclectic, ranging from the sublime to the profane. He could reproduce with perfect pitch, any music he heard, and knew all the songs, word and note from Muppet Treasure Island; he had a beautiful tenor voice.

John is well known for his humor, his silly little laugh and quirky grin; and for his ability to listen on a deep level, and wise in his counsel. He had a kind and forgiving nature, nonjudgmental of others, which is why they loved being around him. He was a loyal and protective of his friends, loving to his family, concerned for their welfare, and respectful and kind to his mother. John lived his life openly and honestly; there were no hidden agendas, no manipulations; he did not use others for personal gain. He was respectful of women and children and kind to animals; he loved dogs and sometimes cats. He laughed a lot, cried sometimes, and never failed at loving.

He is survived by his mother Noqah Elisi; uncles Mike, David, Greg and John Adkins; his Aunt Jan Adkins and cousins Josh and Brandon Adkins of Tennessee; adopted brothers: Zeke, Sam and Gabe Tenhoff of Nome, half brother and sister Brandon and Kelly Bunce of Oregon; adopted parents Lee and Jess Tenhoff of Homer, and John and Nita Klimp of Nome; "more-like-brothers-than-friends": Mitchell and Tom of Homer, Calvin, Joseph, Javier, Mike, Emily and Laura of Nome; Jeremiah and Alex Rhodd of South Dakota; and many other friends across the country. He kept people close to his heart, no matter the distance or time, his love and friendship never wavered. He was honest and solid friend. He was predeceased by his grandparents Charles and Elizabeth Adkins of North Carolina; and cousin Keith Grindstaff of North Carolina.

The day I felt you come into this life there beneath my heart I knew you were an expression of God's transcendent love, a gift sublime. Thank you, son, for the greatest honor ever bestowed upon any woman: that of being your mother. You go now, and do the work you are meant to do, with all our love and gratitude for the gift of you.

A Memorial Service will be held on Sunday, September 30, 2012 at 5 pm at Old St. Joseph's Hall/ Anvil City Square Nome, Alaska. For information call: 907-299-6448.

Rotary Citizen of the Year 2012

Each year the Rotary Club of Nome selects a Nomeite who exemplifies service to the community above and beyond their call of duty. This year Nicole Scherer was voted to rank among the names listed on the plaque in City Hall honoring those individuals who serve our community.

Scherer's 10 years of residence in Nome started with a job as a summer waitress for local eatery "Fat Freddies." Nikki Polk, as was her maiden name before getting married to Zeb Scherer, then worked full-time at the Nome Community Center with Project Venture and then moved on to teach at Nome Elementary School.

Outside of work she donated countless hours to various projects and organizations. Nikki was active and instrumental in groups like D.A.W.N., the Nome Literacy Council and the Nome Arts Council acting in various leadership capacities. She was on the Board of the Nome Community Center as a way to show support to the organization. Nikki also had a strong focus on youth development through Drama Club, Summercise, Ski Coach and the Young Author's Showcase she created. In her "spare time", Nikki was organizing a food drive for the Nome Food Bank or helping to organize Nome's Relay for Life.

Nikki left Nome for Anchorage last summer to accommodate her growing family and to allow her husband Zeb to get the chance to follow his dreams of becoming a pilot for Alaska Airlines. Nicole Scherer is a very special individual who has been a valuable asset to the community of Nome and it is The Rotary Club of Nome's honor to award her the Citizen of the Year Award.

ROTARIAN OF THE YEAR 2012 - Nikki Scherer, here in costume performing in 'My Fair Lady', was voted by the Nome Rotary Club to be Rotarian of the year 2012.

Searchers find drowning victim, still search for companion

By Diana Haecker

After a four-day search for two boaters who were reported missing in Norton Sound between Koyuk and Unalakleet, searchers found the body of Debra Kimoktoak, 48, on Friday Sept. 28, on the beach about 30 miles south of Unalakleet.

Alaska State Troopers said on Monday that pending further leads, they suspend their search efforts for David Slwooko, 41, who was with Kimoktoak and their two dogs on a boat trip from Koyuk to Unalakleet.

day, Sept. 24 and were supposed to arrive in Unalakleet that evening but never did.

According to the troopers, they were traveling in a 17-foot aluminum magnum boat with a 75-horsepower outboard motor.

On Tuesday, they were reported overdue, troopers were notified and a search began, first with an airplane and a boat from Koyuk. Troopers say that high wind and extremely low water hampered the search.

The Coast Guard joined the search on Thursday after AST requested their assistance late Wednesday night. The U.S. Coast Guard brought in a Jayhawk helicopter from their forward operating location in Barrow, a Kodiak-based HC-130 Hercules airplane that was in Anchorage and diverted Cutter Bertholf to Norton Sound.

After 33 hours of searching an area of about 2,700 square miles, Coast Guard crews couldn't locate the couple and suspended their search on Thursday at 9:50 p.m.

A trooper airplane had spotted the skiff washed ashore approximately 35 miles southwest of Unalakleet.

The Coast Guard helicopter was able to land at the beach and they found the boat overturned, with the outboard motor ripped off the skiff but still attached to the boat by cables.

The vessel ID numbers confirmed that it was indeed the missing boat.

At that point, the searchers presumed Kimoktoak and Slwooko drowned and advised their families.

The Coast Guard decided to suspend their search, based on the length of time the people were missing, the loss of the vessel and the inclement weather that slimmed down their chances of survival. "Suspending a search for missing people is one of the most difficult decisions we have to make," said U.S. Coast Guard Capt. Gregory Sanial.

Troopers continued the aerial search along the shoreline. On Friday, a Bering Air helicopter pilot spotted a body on shore, near Shorty Cove, about 30 miles south of Unalakleet. Also found in the vicinity

Run-off elections to be held for council seats

By Diana Haecker

Unofficial and yet preliminary results of Tuesday's municipal election indicate that Nome Common Council seats "C" and "D" probably need to go through run-off elections as the top candidates did not achieve a 50 percent plus one vote to claim victory. Incumbents of seats for utility board and school board seats prevailed at the polls. Here are preliminary numbers.

Randy Pomeranz, running for Nome Common Council seat "C", got 314 votes over challengers Randy Oles with 197 votes and Kenny Hughes with 152 votes. There were five write-in votes for seat "C".

Stan Andersen, running for seat "D", got 319 votes over challengers Nikolai Ivanoff with 125 votes and Jim West Jr. with 221 votes. Four write-in votes were cast for seat "D".

The utility board seats "B" and "C" were uncontested. Voters cast 573 votes for Fred Moody, the incumbent of seat "B." Seat B is a two-year term. There were 28 write-inc

David Barron received 610 votes for seat "C", a three year term. There were ten write-ins for seat "C".

Betsy Brennan won the race for school board seat "C". Brennan received 379 votes. Challenger Monica Rose got 280 votes. There were four write-in votes.

Uncontested school board seat "D", a three year term, went to lone candidate Paula Davis with 551 votes. There were 51 write-ins for school board seat "D".

The seat for the Nome representative on the board of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. went to incumbent Don Stiles with 375 votes over challenger Louie Green Jr. who received 287 votes. There were no write-ins in that particular

Out of 2,356 registered Nome voters, only 781 ballots were counted, with 30 questioned.

The Nome City Council canvassed the election results on Thursday in a special meeting at noon.

It was not clear at press time when NSEDC would announce and make official the results for the NSEDC representative election.

Kids win big as Council doles out NSEDC funding shares

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council voted to spend the entire NSEDC $200,000 community improvement share on youth programs. Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. earmarked $100,000 of Nome's share for youth programs. The Council decided to back young people with the whole amount.

On the Web:

www.nomenugget.net E-mail:

Councilman Stan Andersen made the motion with the split going like this:

Multipurpose all-season activity building for summer and winter activities, $100,000; after-school activities and swimming lessons handled by Nome Public Schools, $55,000; Boys and Girls Club operated by Nome Community Center, $25,000; Covenant Youth of Alaska's shop activities mentoring program fostered by James Ventress, $15,000; painting lane lines on the swimming pool for use of high school swimming activities and community lap swimming, $5,000.

The Council unanimously approved the choices with an amendment by Councilwoman Mary Knodel to take some from the $100,000 activity building money for Arctic Access, a program to put a motorized lift at the swimming pool to provide accessibility for persons with mobility limitations.

The after-school activities money will fund driver's education.

"I have 25 juniors and seniors that wanted driver's training if it became available, "NPS Supt. Mike Brawner told the Council in thanking them for the funding. "Sixty sophomores and freshmen also said "'I'd take driver's education too.""

Other organizations put in creative proposals that were aired at a work session earlier this month. Ideas submitted by Nome Emergency Shelter Team, Nome Fishermen's Association—Hobson Creek hatchery, Nome Chamber of Commerce, and a summer Wellness Camp program sponsored by Nome Eskimo Community, NSHC C.A.M.P. and Nome Community Center, went unfunded this go around, as did a list of three priorities submitted by four Nome Citizens.

Karen Mitchell, Lauri Harlan, Scott Kent and Joyce Soong proposed the following ideas: using the entire amount to create an off-theroad roadway from Icy View to town for use by motorized vehicles; using the entire amount to open the Nome Recreation Center free to all during the winter; and three, to sunset sales tax charged on items bought by Nome residents for the winter months "which are already an economical strain on all of us."

The Council vowed to start looking for money to help the youth Wellness Camp.

In other business, the Council unanimously passed an ordinance amending the City's tax law. The Council and administration have been working on the updates for a couple of years.

Some of the changes are: It clarifies the state contractor exemption. A proposed non-resident exemption did not fly with the Council at a work session.

• Rules out sales tax on goods leased or sold that never have been or will not be within the physical boundaries of the City of Nome.

• Government entities will no longer need to obtain an exemption certificate, while non-profit, educational and hospital entities will still need the certificate.

• Eliminates the requirement for filing sales tax returns for months in which no sales were made and allows businesses with a good track record for filing timely reports to go to a quarterly reporting system.

• Requires a business to file a timely return to be eligible to file an amended return.

• Clarifies that the amount of delinquency and the name of the delinquent vendor may be published.

• Sets a penalty of $50 for late recontinued on page 4

My wife and I visited our daughter in Nome, Richelle Fisher a PA at the hospital, this past June for our first trip ever to Alaska. We had a fabulous time and really appreciated the friendliness of everyone we met in Nome. My wife actually got to participate in the "Great Wells Fargo Bank Robbery" as the lady in green with the spinning wheel. I thought that was really nice for her to be allowed as an "outsider" to participate. Richelle and I spent a day fourwheeling in the mountains and I can't tell you how beautiful that was and how much I enjoyed it. My wife got to try her hand looking for gold, we're still poor, and we got to spend our 42nd anniversary in a small cabin on the Bering Sea. Did the Polar Bear swim during the Festival of the Midnight Sun and generally had a ball. Thanks for being a friendly place to visit. We can't wait to come back. Don't let them tear down the towers on Signal Hill. What a land-

To the Editor,

Last Friday September 21, as I was loading my child in the truck, I heard what sounded like an alarm on the South side of the grade school where the busses line up every day. I found a Nome School district maintenance employee being threatened by a bus driver to move his equipment. The 4th Grade teacher banged on the window attempting to quiet him down to no avail. The bus driver then turned the loader that was holding the man lift in the air and began attempting to move it with the worker in the air. This amounts to attempted assault with a motor vehicle and after stopping he continued his yelling with foul language while the school room window was open for the children to hear.

Both the language, conduct and reckless endangerment using a motor vehicle should have had charges filed by the principal who came out to witness some of the behavior and also took the report from the teacher. I met with the principal Monday morning and he said he had requested his termination with the Superintendent but due to shortage of drivers it was uncertain what would be done.

I made my case to the Superintendent Tuesday when I learned he was still driving and did not receive any response except that school policy and their attorney was handling it? First, money should not be an issue here. Morgan Enterprises should, at their cost, supply another driver even if they have to fly one in until a replacement driver can be found. I advise all parents who use the bus system to call or contact the Nome School District and remove their children from the bus as long as he drives even school if necessary? When the district budget for attendance is at risk possibly they will deal with this in a more serious mat-

To the Editor, Just when you think things can't get any crazier, they do.

Late last Wednesday night, two Nome police officers delivered to my door, a protective order issued by the Kotzebue Superior Court. NSEDC lawyer Kyan Olanna swore under oath in a notarized affidavit the following; NSEDC is the petitioner, I am the respondent:

"On July 31, 2012 in the Bering Strait Native Corporation Boardroom in Nome Alaska, Respondent refused to leave a board meeting when asked to do so, based on his refusal to turn off an unauthorized recording device."

"Respondent became verbally abusive toward NSEDC board members.

"Respondent behaved in a physically threatening manner toward Kyan Olanna, who was the employee

Volunteers for 75 Years

Turn out. When the call goes out, the volunteers turn out. They leave the comfort of a warm bed, the security of family activities, or the satisfaction of a supper table. They leave home in darkness, blizzards, rainstorms and frigid cold. The Nome Volunteer firefighters and ambulance personnel deserve our thanks and gratitude for their dedication to making Nome a better place to live. They might be rough, tough and seemingly grumpy, but their hearts are in the right place. The hours of practice, training and continuing education our volunteers devote to perfecting their skills is a tribute to their dedication.

They never hesitate to reach out to our neighbors when an emergency happens. Nome volunteers load a plane and head out to help. They have turned out to put out fires in Teller, Wales, Stebbins, Gambell, Savoonga and other local communities. This brings to light the need for smaller rural communities to have trained firefighter volunteers and functional, adequate firefighting equipment. The State of Alaska has considerable money invested on our bush communities. We have clinics, schools, business and public buildings in each village. We need to provide fire protection for these structures. We need to recognize that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Fire prevention and preparedness is vital.

As Nomeites know, our fire department is one of the best volunteer organizations in the nation. Back in 1934 Nome learned the devastation of fire. The town was decimated. The Fire of 1934 gave Nomeites to "never again" let such destruction happen. The NVFD deserves our thanks and recognition for their efforts. Let's all join them to celebrate their 75th anniversary Oct. 20 at the Nome Rec. Center. - N.L.M-

A Look at the Past

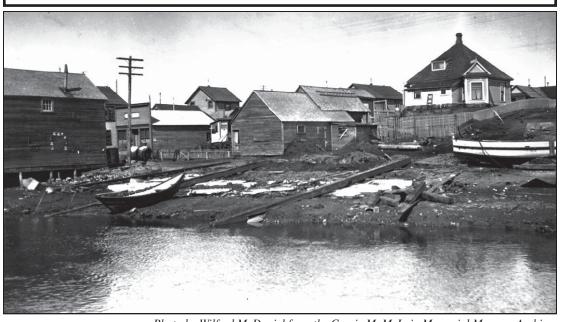

Photo by Wilfred McDaniel from the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum Archives DOES THIS LOOK FAMILIAR? - It is the Crowley fuel office that still stands today at West E and Lomen Streets. The lower buildings are on River Street. The one story cottage building is also remembered as the office of the Lomen Commercial Company and later the Arctic Lighterage Company. It was built in 1906 as the residence of Alfred Guinan, manager of the Hot Air Mining Co. which operated near Glacier Creek.

A Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

cerpts from "Alaska Beckons" written by Wilfred in 1943. His love of Nome is quite evident in that his experiences in this wild land are still fresh in his mind four decades later. At the end of last week's passage, Wilfred noted that "Alaska has her joking moods too, as we were soon to experience!" Well, let's just see what he meant by that statement!

ALASKA BECKONS By Wilfred A. McDaniel Sr.

October came at last, two weeks more of work-three at the mostand the season would end. Short, sunny days favored us as we strove to utilize the precious time. During the changing season, schools of porpoises and white whales were frequently seen off shore, and flocks of screaming gulls hovered over the sea, near shore or rested on the beach.

While using the sluice fork in the boxes, throwing out the heavy stones, which had accumulated during the sluicing, I was surprised to throw out a tomcod! Soon more appeared, some in fragments, cut up in the pump runner, others intact! I called to Ed, "Here's where we have a fish dinner!" The astonished workmen peered into the sluice-boxes while fish continued to come from the pump, some flopping over the riffles, others not so fortunate! The tomcod season was on!

This latest prank of nature was, indeed, serious. The water supply was lessened and work stopped while the pump was opened and cleaned. The openings in the pump propeller would become choked by the fish, cutting off the water supply, and making it necessary to stop the engine and clear away the mess, resulting in a great loss of time. At times we were compelled to quit work entirely, as nothing could be accomplished! In an effort to prevent the fish from being drawn into the pump, a coarse screen was placed over the in-take at the submerged end of the suction pipe. This kept the tomcod out, but it soon collected a coating of sea moss, which eventually shut off the water, and merely shifted the problem.

The tomcod of these northern waters grow to a length of ten or fourteen inches, and in the late fall move in close to shore, in schools of countless numbers, where they remain for many months. When the arctic pack drifts in and the sea is ice-covered, they stay in the shallow water, close to shore where many are caught during the winter. Holes are cut through the thinner ice, and fishing is done by snagging them on a triple hook attached with line to a short stick. No bait is necessary, a red rag tied above the hook is sufficient to attract them.

When the flocks of seagulls move up the coast, indicating that the schools of tomcod were also moving on, work would be resumed. This condition continued to be, more or less, a problem for the remainder of the season.

NJUS power cost to remain the same

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome power consumers will pay the same fuel surcharge this winter as last, about 18.4 cents. That amount figures in with the cost of production minus state assistance to yield a price per kilowatt just short of a quarter.

Nome Joint Utility System took delivery of 2.6 million gallons of diesel in three shipments this summer. There was little fuel remaining in inventory to average into the new fuel cost. The newly delivered fuel for utility generators cost an average of $3.21 per gallon, according John K. Handeland, NJUS manager, lower than the anticipated cost of $4 per gallon based on oil prices earlier in the summer. Last year's average cost per gallon was $3.08.

The difference in fuel surcharge computed to two-tenths of a cent per kilowatt. The NJUS Board of Directors on Sept. 18 opted to approve keeping the fuel surcharge the same.

After a state subsidy that applies to the first 500 kilowatts of residential use the cost per kilowatt for NJUS residential consumers pencils out to approximately 23 cents per kilowatt and 40 cents per kilowatt after the first 500 kilowatts used.

The utility has been looking into the use of "smart" two-way communication meters that would give consumers immediate feedback on level of power use and allow the utility to take immediate readings remotely from meters, as well as stop and start meters on houses. This way, smart meters would allow NJUS to give favorable rates for use of power during periods of low power demand, and adjust rates to discourage use of power during peak demand times. However, smart meters cost considerably more at $300-$600 each, compared to standard one-way meters at $100 a copy. NJUS staff was looking into possible funding assistance for the smart meters.

In other business, Handeland gave the utility board members the following updates:

The U.S. Coast Guard inspected the tank farm last month and found it in order, except for minor updates required by changed regulations.

The renewal process for the NJUS Air Quality Operating Permit is in progress to be submitted by March 1—submitted early to avoid a new lengthy renewal process.

Line crew construction-related activities have included clearing of the new bridge right-of-way area (removing poles and transformers), completing a new underground service for the FAA in advance of their planned demolition of the old flight service station, and continued work on replacing the underground circuit out the causeway at Port of Nome.

A couple of small older waste water treatment plant pumps at the River Street facility have failed and been replaced; a larger pump seized and was replaced with a bypass pump system during repairs. Utility staff has suspicion that some of the problems could be later effects of a storm last year that flooded and overtaxed the system, Handeland said.

Shortage of equipment and manpower have hampered progress on water and sewer construction activities with the summer's excessive rain also being a factor.

"Due to competition from other construction projects, we were unable to hire all our equipment operators and experienced laborers from past seasons," Handeland said. "Together with limited availability of end dump trucks, we were unable to field an additional construction crew as planned."

On the east end of town, the utility was able to replace mains and services on L and M streets and Third and Fourth avenues and connect them into existing mains on N Street—all that could be completed this season. N Street itself and a portion of 4th Avenue east of N Street will go on the program for next summer. EPA has agreed to extend the funding deadline for repairs.

THANK YOU, NOME—Councilwoman Mary Knodel, who resigned her seat effective Oct. 6 following many years of service, thanked the community of Nome for letting her family make their home here. Shown attending her last Nome Common Council meeting Sept. 24, Knodel said she would return to Nome in May. Knodel has closed her Front Street business, Arctic Trading Post, after 37 years of operation.

- Applies tax payments to the oldest debt first.
- Increases the trigger for assessing audit costs against the tax collector from $100 to $1,000.
- Deletes a provision allowing requests for extensions for filing tax returns
- The Council postponed any change of language allowing partial exemption for pull-tabs and other language concerning proceeds from pull-tabs pending the availability of more information.

An amendment offered by Councilman Jerald Brown concerning sales tax on pull-tabs was withdrawn when Mayor Denise Michels, backed by the City's attorney, Brooks Chandler (via phone) ruled that Brown and Andersen had conflicts of interest concerning the pull-tab issue.

The Council granted a $157.59 fee waiver to Arctic Pinkies/Walk for the Cure for use of Old St. Joe's.

The Council adopted an ordinance that will send monetary fines forfeited from uncontested violations of certain ordinances and traffic laws to the City. Up to now, the money has gone to the State of Alaska.

The Council accepted the resignation of Mary Knodel from the Council with many thanks from the panel and the public. Her leaving is effective Oct. 6.

"I want to thank the Council, the management and the City crews. It has been great to sit here all these years," Knodel said.

Dredger finds 4.9-ounce nugget

By Diana Haecker

Jordan Carpenter couldn't believe his eyes. After having run a 10-inch suction hose for three hours on the night of Sept. 25, he decided to come up for a short break at 3 a.m.. The ocean has been stirred up, it was a murky affair to be down there and Carpenter couldn't see much but cloudy waters.

He climbed aboard the dredge Julianne and his tender greeted him with the words, "Dude, you're not gonna believe this."

Right there, on top of the sluice box sat a gold nugget half the size of one's palm. The visibility, Carpenter said, had been horrible that night and he didn't see what he was dredging up.

Even the lights mounted on his diving mask weren't much of a help. But despite dredging blindly, he got lucky.

While nuggets that size are a rare find even inland, having found such a sizable chunk of gold in the water hasn't been heard of.

Carpenter, originally from Olympia, Washington, is a hired diver onboard the Julianne and has been here only this summer.

He works for an outfit called Bering Subsea Mining Suction Dredging owned by David Mc-Cully.

Carpenter said he works for a share of what he dredges up during his six-hour shifts, but he won't be able to keep that nugget. "No, my boss wants it," he said with a bitter-sweet smile in his voice.

Fire burns down house in Gambell

A Gambell residence burned down to the ground in the evening hours of Saturday, Sept. 27 in a fire ignited by electrical dysfunction, according to Gambell fire officials. Nobody was harmed as the sole occupant of the home, Brendan Oseuk, was outside the building at the time of the fire

Gambell Fire Chief Troy Apatiki said that the fire was reported around 8 p.m. and firemen immediately responded. "All pitched in, but ultimately our equipment failed," said Apatiki. The closest water hydrant was out of reach for fire department volunteers to connect the fire hose to. Apatiki said they ended up using a 200-gallon water container on a tractor with a water pump to fight the flames.

They managed to extinguish the fire that night, but embers kept smoldering until the next day, Apatiki

Alaska State Trooper Sgt. Charles Cross added that eventually firefighters dumped dirt and gravel on the house. The state fire marshal won't be investigating the cause of the fire.

The Red Cross is assisting Oseuk with items needed.

Fire chief Troy Apatiki said his department is in dire need for equipment of all sorts. "We need any kind of donations for the Gambell Fire department," Apatiki said. "We need fire resistant gear, boots, gloves, large jackets and pants, an inch and a half hose, two inch hose, we need any kind of donation people can make," Apatiki said. He said that the Gambell volunteer fire department has 20 volunteers on its roster, but they haven't received any fire fighting gear since a fire hall was built in 2001 thanks to federal dollars secured by the late Senator Ted Stevens.

Apatiki added that a lot of homes in Gambell were built in the 1970s and those homes begin to show faulty electrical systems that are a potential fire hazard. So far, he said, his department had to respond to four fires this year, three residential fires and one junk pile on fire.

Successes and challenges revealed in the school district report card

By Lori HeadThe Nome Board of Education received the District Report Card from the prior school year, 2011-2012, at their September 27 work session. It was not the glowing report that one would hope for, however, it had some positive news. Director of Federal Programs Jon Berkeley pointed out that the graduation rate had increased to 71 percent. Board President Betsy Brennan also noted that although there is a lot of work to do, Nome scores are generally aligned with the State results. The high percentage of students, grades 3 to 10, scoring below or far below proficiency in reading, writing, math and science seems to be a statewide prob-

One part of the report included a two-year trend chart comparing how 3rd through 10th graders scored on three assessments - reading, writing and math - and a science assessment of only the 4th, 8th and 10th graders. Board member Barb Amarok was discouraged to see that in writing and math, six out of the eight grades tested showed decreasing percentages of proficiency. On a positive note, there were proficiency gains in two out of three grades tested in science, and in reading there were only two grade levels that showed drops in proficiency, with the other six grades either at the same level or increased proficiency. Superintendent Mike Brawner commended teachers for the work that they have done and continue to do and reassured the board that while not satisfied with the report, he feels that the district is getting better at reviewing test results and making adjustments to address proficiency

Alaska STEPP (Alaska Steps Toward Educational Progress and Partnership)

Nome is "just getting started" with AK STEPP according to Berkeley. He described this online tool as "the future of district and school compliance with the State." It replaces the paper-based School Improvement Plan, which is required to be filed once a year by a district at an AYP (Adequate Yearly Progress) status of Level 2 or above – Nome is at AYP Level 4.

A committee in Nome will be formed soon and have access to the online document. According to the AK STEPP login site, "It will guide improvement teams through a continuous cycle of assessment, planning, implementation, and progress tracking using the domains and key indicators from the AK Self-Study

Drivers Education class

The first session of Drivers Education will involve 30 students, either juniors or seniors at the high school. The course will be twenty hours in length: eight driving and twelve in the classroom and taught by Terry Roelfsema, Jr./Sr. High Counselor. Roelfsema explained the classroom requirements could be completed in three weeks, ideally. Then, depending on how busy the student's schedule is, the eight hours of driving would require coordinating with the instructor sometime after 4:00 p.m. or on Saturdays.

Roelfsema is planning on attending training outside of Nome to become DMV certified. He would then be able to administer not only the test for the Learner's Permit, but the actual driving test. This could be in place as early as November.

Approximately 60 freshman and sophomores have been identified as interested in a second session.

Students who successfully complete the class will receive a certificate from the Nome Public Schools. Many automobile insurance companies offer discounts to students who complete this course.

Culture Camp

Jr./Sr. High School Principal Scott Handley, along with numerous other camp participants, shared insights gained through attendance including a greater understanding of Nome student's lifestyles, how hard they work and how to make classrooms more culturally relevant. Handley stated that as a result of the camp, three attendees are now taking an Inupiaq language class. They also presented a slide show of activities that took place at the second annual Culture Camp, funded by NSEDC.

The school board will meet again in regular session on October 9, 2012, at 5:30 p.m. in the Elementary School library.

CVRF seeks larger share of Community Development Quota fisheries

By Laurie McNicholas

The Coastal Villages Region Fund, one of six companies in the Western Alaska Community Development Quota Program, is seeking public support for its efforts to obtain a larger portion of the federal fisheries resources allocated to the CDQ

CVRF wants a share of CDQ fishery resources in keeping with the total population of its 20 member villages in the Kuskokwim River area.

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., which represents 15 CDQ communities in the Bering Strait region, does not want to reopen discussion of CDQ reallocations.

The CDQ program receives 10 percent of the annual harvest of pollock, other groundfish species and crab in the Bering Sea and Aleutian Islands management area. The North Pacific Fishery Management Council and the National Marine Fisheries Service co-manage BSAI fisheries.

The 2006 U.S. Coast Guard and Maritime Act set the reallocation from each CDQ fishery to each CDQ entity at the same levels they were in March 2006

The percentage of CDQ groundfish and crab resources reallocated to each CDQ entity varies by fishery. The 2006 Coast Guard Act also created the Western Alaska Community Development Assn. composed of the six CDQ companies to administer the CDQ program.

Census shows its member villages gained 500 residents and now rank highest in total population among the CDO entities.

The company wants to change the sources among the CDQ groups to weigh population levels above other factors. Congressional action would be required to effect that change.

'CVRF represents 20 of the 65 villages and approximately 9,300 of the 28,000 residents who reside in CDQ villages," reads a press release issued Sept. 13 by CVRF. "According to the most recent U.S. Census, CVRF's member villages have among the highest rates of unemployment and poverty, among the lowest per capita income of the 65 CDQ villages, and, according to the Denali Commission, the most distressed communities.'

When the CDQ Program was being developed in the early 1990s, the 20 member villages of CVRF chose to form a single CDQ group, while other villages chose to form multiple smaller, separate CDQ

The villages that formed smaller CDQ groups continue to receive more fish per CDQ resident that the two largest groups, which include CVRF and NSEDC. "CVRF represents more people and villages than the smallest three of the six CDQ groups combined," says the press release. A table developed by CVRF from 2010 Census data lists the total population of NSEDC's member communities at 9,070.

(BBEDC), 17 villages, population 5,411; Central Bering Sea Fishermen's Assn. (CBSFA), one village, population 425; and Yukon Delta Fisheries Development Assn. (YDFDA), six villages, population

A letter to CVRF from the chief executive officers of the other five CDQ group dated Aug. 9, 2012 provides reasons for their opposition. "During the period leading up to the Coast Guard Act, the process for determining the proper level of allocations for each group was extremely contentious," the letter states. "Historical use, proximity to the resource, performance, and population levels were all exhaustively debated and weighted differently by each of he groups in support of their position.

The State of Alaska, under then Governor Frank Murkowski, had recommended certain allocation levels. Congressional, federal and state views on the proper level of allocations diverged widely.

It was an extremely divisive issue that affected all the CDQ groups.

"After passage of the Coast Guard bill, Ted Stevens and all of the Alaska congressional offices met with us and urged us to put the past behind," the letter continues.

"They further recommended that we work within the new CDQ framework and focus our energies on the betterment of own regions as well as that of the State. And, they warned us that tougher times were coming and that we needed to stand together on our own to defend the program."

The CVRF board of directors replied to the CEOs of the other CDQ groups in a letter dated Sept. 7. 2012. The letter concludes with the following statements.

"You ask us to accept CDQ allocations that are highly inequitable and benefit your CDQ companies at the expense of our CDQ residents. You ask our residents to continue to accept second-class citizenship in the CDQ program in order to 'unite our diverse populations.'

"We cannot accept, and the people from our villages who elected us, can not accept either," the letter continues. "We urge you to take this matter to your own residents, to the people you serve. We hope that with a better understanding of the CDQ inequities and weaknesses, the residents of all 65 CDQ villages will accept the changes that are needed to strengthen and protect the program for the future. We hope that people of the CDQ program will agree to an equitable allocation that honors the tradition of sharing among our peo-

The CVRF board sent copies of the letter to the Alaska Congressional delegation, Gov. Sean Parnell and other state and federal officials.

LAST FUEL DELIVERY — Vitus Marine Tanker Moor made the last fuel delivery of the year for Bonanza Fuel, topping off the fuel tanks for the winter.

NSEDC's Point of View: Reallocation is not a risk worth taking

By Tyler Rhodes, NSEDC Communications Director

Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation's Board of Directors were unanimous in their decision to not join an effort seeking a reallocation of Community Development Quota. NSEDC believes this is in the best interest of our member communities and their residents, NSEDC as an organization, and the CDQ program as a whole.

Simply put, NSEDC believes this is not a gamble worth taking, especially in light of the success we have achieved over the past six years. NSEDC believes there is much more potential risk than reward in dedicating our focus and energy to resuming the allocation battle, which has never been based solely on population. To change CDQ allocations would literally take an act of Congress, and there is no guarantee that the end results would be any more favorable - or even maintain the status quo-for NSEDC or the CDQ program.

The establishment of fishery allocations, CDQ or otherwise, is inherently a political and contentious process. Prior to 2006 when reallocations were an ongoing struggle between the six CDQ groups, NSEDC constantly fought to have population figure larger in the distribution. Allocations, however, were never so black-and-white as to be based on population alone. Politics along with several other considerations-right or wrong—have consistently shared the forefront of influencing allocation decisions. These include metrics such as proximity to fisheries, performance in harvesting, financial performance, existing infrastructure and regional economic conditions, among many others. It is far-fetched to believe that all other considerations would be abandoned in favor of population alone if Congress were to seriously consider reallocation.

This does not mean that NSEDC believes the current allocation structure is ideal for the Norton Sound region. Would NSEDC like to see population play a larger role in allocations? Absolutely. But do the current allocations prohibit or unacceptably limit NSEDC's ability to serve our member communities and sustain the organization? NSEDC's performance would indicate no

Since the allocations became fixed in 2006, NSEDC has been able to maintain and grow our regional benefit and development programs while introducing several new substantial initiatives. In the same time-frame, NSEDC also made new investments in our regional and greater Bering Sea operations while growing our asset base. To cite just a few examples, since 2006 NSEDC

Invested $3.3 million in providing scholarships for 1,321 member community residents; Implemented our Community Energy Fund, dedicating a total of $15 million ($1 million to each member community) for alternative or more efficient energy infrastructure; Dedicated $10.5 million in total funding to member communities through our Community Benefit Share program. Communities spend these funds to address priorities identified through a community meeting process; Initiated our Consolidated Bulk Fuel Program, allowing NSEDC to use our financial strength to buy fuel in bulk on behalf of vendors in member communities, realizing savings through economy of scale and strong credit. NSEDC charges no interest or administrative fees for the service, saving vendors and residents considerable sums on fuel; Provided two energy subsidies to combat particularly high utility prices during difficult economic times. These two subsidies provided a $500 credit toward each member community household in both 2008 and 2012. The two efforts combined applied more than $2.5 million toward member community residents' electric bills; Implemented the Small Business Initiative which awards grants each year to new or expanding businesses in the region through a competitive process; Grew our asset base (which includes vessels, quota, infrastructure and investments in the stock market) by 71% to more than $186 million; Grew our direct employment base by 80% while increasing wages to those direct employees by 85%. In 2011, NSEDC paid out wages of nearly $4.1 million to 327 individuals, 90% of them residing in NSEDC member communities; Expanded and grew our regional fishery operations, investing in seafood plants, tender vessels, docks and other fishery infrastructure. The number of permit holders delivering to NSEDC's in-region seafood operations grew by 72 percent over the period while payments made to those fishermen climbed by 15 percent, totaling nearly $4.2 million in 2011; Expanded our salmon rehabilitation and fishery research division, which operates a wide range of counting and enhancement projects throughout the region.

NSEDC also continued to operate and maintain our legacy programs, such as granting initiatives, loan programs, training programs, and emergency assistance.

These are just a few examples of how NSEDC has been able to use the resources allocated to us through the CDQ program to the benefit of our member communities and residents. NSEDC believes that our focus and energy should not be dedicated to political warfare, but should remain on our mission of creating opportunity, providing programs and making investments that improve the economies and conditions in our 15 member communities.

Pushing for CDQ allocation amendments within the Magnuson-Stevens Act means opening the door for further CDQ program revisions, risking the stability, foundation and program framework that NSEDC has benefitted from for the last six years. Gambling for a slightly bigger piece of the CDQ pie is not in the best interest of NSEDC's member communities and residents, NSEDC itself, nor the CDQ program as a whole.

able catch (TAC) of Bering Sea pollock allocated to the CDQ program. The annual pollock TAC supports an industry valued at $1 billion or more. Even 1 percent of the pollock TAC is of immense value. CDQ pollock harvest royalties are not taxable. The CDQ pollock harvest has been the economic driver for all CDQ companies. CVRF annually receives the highest share of CDQ pollock—24 percent, which is equal to 2.4 percent of the TAC.

In a phone interview with The Nome Nugget, CVRF Project Manager Dawson Hoover pointed out that CVRF represents 33 percent of the CDQ population. He said NSEDC receives 22 percent of the CDQ pollock allocation (2.2 percent of the annual pollock TAC), and represents 32 percent of the CDQ population

"We hope NSEDC will reconsider their position for the benefit of the people they serve," Hoover added.

APICDA receives 14 percent of CDQ pollock; BBEDC, 21 percent; CBSFA, 5 percent; and YDFDA, 14 percent.

Information about the activities and finances of each CDQ company appears in its annual report. Last month all six CDQ companies published annual reports for 2011 with information about their activities and finances. Each CDQ group has posted its 2011 annual report on their website.

Editor's note: See NSEDC's statement, left, in opposing efforts to seek reallocation of CDQ fishery resources based strictly on population.

Nome Girls in third, Nome Boys in sixth at XC State Championships

By Tara Schmidt

Nome's cross country teams have improved their state championship standings by three places, the girls ascending to third runner-up and the boys team placing sixth in the Class 1-2-3A races.

Junior Rosa Schmidt fought her way to second place, only a stride ahead of Grace Christian's Morgan Lash, both clocking 20:06. The state champion, Thorne Bay freshman Taylee Nyquest had crossed the finish line 33 seconds earlier in 19:33 after holding a commanding lead the entire race. In fourth was the defending champion from Grace Christian, Elle Arnold.

Hannah Tozier bettered her State Championship placement from the previous year by ten spots, finishing 17th right behind teammate Senora Ahmasuk. Both finished in 21 minutes 46 seconds. This was the first State final for Ahmasuk and for teammates Tori Thomas and Alexis Hutson, who placed 63rd and 101st respectively. Returning runner Jannelle Trowbridge sliced a minute from her personal record on the course, putting her in 97th among the state's most competitive 1, 2 and 3A harriers.

"They just get faster," Head Coach Jeff Collins said giddily as sprinting from the start of 1-2-3A High School Girls Race at Bartlett High School, through the woods, to a spectator spot 1,000 meters into the cross country trail. He's already thinking about next season, when the Nanooks will continue to build on their success.

Light, fluffy snow had drifted down the morning of the race, making the air feel crisp yet heavy with anticipation. The clouds broke during the first race, and the crowd was bathed in sunlight. The snow melted, and the girls' feet drove the water into the mud and kicked it back up behind them.

"quick" sand of the Pit. In Talkeetna and Unalakleet the rain poured in fat bullets, and in Nome the deluge beat down with the added discomfort of 30 mph winds.

THE NOME NUGGET

This time was no different. The Nanooks stampeded through the muck like logs in a mudslide. Tim Schmidt led the charge, placing 12th in the last state championship of his high school career. Nick Morgan, also a senior, ran his farewell race in 20:02, shaving 20 seconds from his personal course record.

Only a second ahead of him was fellow Nomeite Junyor Erikson, a junior, who passed Morgan in the last 100 meters. Freshmen Lief Erikson and Degnan Lawrence, and sophomore James Jorgensen ran solidly in their first state championship, placing 64th, 114th, and 104th.

Welcome Wagon 2012

By Darla Grediagin

Welcome Wagon helped 38 of our new teachers get through the fun of obtaining driver's licenses, food, and all of the other fun stuff that you need when you live in the Bering Strait School District.

The Welcome Wagon Team outside of the famous Moose's Tooth restaurant.

It is always fun to see the new teachers arrive in Alaska and take in the beauty of Anchorage. As people remark about the mountains, trees, and other splendor, the guides let them know that as great as Anchorage might be, the real Alaska is what they are going to.

Having breakfast at ihop.

Julie Wileman, Timothy Main, and Cassandra Heaton socializing at Humpy's Restaurant.

Janice Hamilton boarding a plane to Unalakleet.

Less shopping that we have had in past years as more teachers take part in online shopping through Amazon and WalMart. This gave us more time for activities. Some of the activities that new teachers took part in were visting The Anchorage Museum and The Alaska Native Heritage Center. Both places received high marks for the new education that our teachers walk away with. We also traveled to Earthquake Park so new teachers could get a good visual of the damage that an earthquake can do.

Lauren Jeffrey and Samantha Marchant having fun.

A thank you from Nona kind of sums up why we do have Welcome Wagon, "As I'm settling into my new home, I am amazed how how prepared I really am. Of course there are things I missed picking up and I'm quickly placing an order to Walmart.com or Amazon but it's really going to be a very small order. Thank you all again."

Ready to leave Anchorage!

Halle Bennet, Melinda Oxereok, Tim Wolcott, and Martha Crawford. Most of these guides had gone through Welcome Wagon in their first year and wanted to give back to the program.

Art Matters

By Kim Sweeney

Instruction in and through the arts produces positive academic results and social effects. The essential thinking tools of recognizing and developing patterns, creating mental representations, carefully observing the world, and creating symbolic, allegorical and metaphorical representations are all realized through arts instruction, especially when it is integrated with core curriculum. (Rabkin & Redmond, 2004). Dance, visual arts, music, film, and theater activities support analytical skills while increasing student motivation to stay in school. In a Spring 2012 survey, 80% of BSSD staff indicated that the arts are very important to a well-rounded education.

Art is an especially effective way for teachers to get to know their students and for students to come to know themselves. Creating art is a personal experience as students draw upon their own resources to produce results to express their views and ideas. Integrating the arts can lead them into a much deeper involvement than just reading text to get an answer.

Shishmaref FEA students who created a film portrait of revered teacher John Sinnok.

By teaching through the arts, teachers create conditions that are ideal for learning. The arts are not just affective and expressive; they are deeply cognitive. The following are some of the benefits found in schools where arts are integrated into core curriculum [Rabkin & Redmond, 2004]:

- Students have a greater emotional investment in their classes
- Students work more diligently and learn from each other
- Parents become more involved
- Teachers collaborate more
- Learning in all subjects becomes attainable through the arts
- Curriculum becomes more authentic, hands-on and project based
- Assessment is more thoughtful and varied
- Teachers' expectations of their students rise.

Not only do the arts appeal to multiple intelligences and help students learn to appreciate differences, but they also teach students the habits of mind that will help them learn discipline and find success in whatever they do. Today's youth will need to be able to use their knowledge of the past and the present to ride the wave of change into the future. We know that creative thinkers, armed with inventiveness and flexibility, are especially able to reassemble learning in new configurations to address change in a positive way.

Bering Strait School District (BSSD) enhances the development of student creativity, a critical 21st century skill, by supporting learning in and through the arts.

2012 has had a number of artful opportunities for staff and students. In January, Alaskan Katie Basile and our own Patrick Cutler worked with Future Educators of Alaska (FEA) students and advisors in Koyuk, Unalakleet, and Shishmaref to create short film portraits honoring local teachers. These films were shown at the statewide FEA gathering in Fairbanks and at the May BSSD Board meeting. Katie went on to a popular Working Weekend, to instruct BSSD staff in digital postcards, imovies, stop motion photography and other skills that can be used alone or in content rich teaching.

In March, Darien Southall, a student from Unalakleet, did an outstanding job at the Poetry Out Loud state competition. Thanks to the staff at Shishmaref School, there was a successful Science and Arts Fair in early March and selected art pieces from that show were mailed to Juneau to be showcased at the State Capitol. Eleven BSSD sites will have Artist in Schools residencies for the 2012-13 school year. Golovin, Shishmaref, Unalakleet, White Mountain, St. Michael, Stebbins, Teller and Savoonga all enjoyed an artist residency at their schools last year. Spring Art surveys were sent to principals, staff and students so that we can use all comments to steer the next BSSD arts efforts.

Cover of the New BSSD Visual Arts Curriculum, created by Gambell Students during the 2011 summer school with the arts.

John Sinnok, a master teacher and carver, recently retired from his position at Shishmaref School, which he held for over 40 years. We thank John for all his years of dedication to our students. Instructional Model facilitator Jim Nelson returned to Washington recently. His cheerful, steadfast energy to support the arts will be missed.

In May, the BSSD board adopted the new K-12 BSSD Visual Arts Curriculum – an important accomplishment after two years of development work and review. This document, available on paper and on the district website, will be helpful for staff wanting to learn about developmentally appropriate visual arts instruction and the "how to" for adding visual arts to their teaching repertoire. To honor local art and artists, the new curriculum is filled with samples of Bering Sea Art.

BSSD again supported teachers to attend this summer's Basic Arts and Special Topics Institutes offered by Alaska Arts Education Consortium, of which BSSD is an active member.

Our district will continue partnering with the Alaska State Council on the Arts for an additional two years with a "New Visions" grant. This means we will have continued support for human, material and financial resources to help us expand the arts into all our schools, across the curriculum. Much of our progress in the past three years has been linked to this ASCA grant and to the work of many BSSD teachers, students and administrators who added the arts through stand-alone and content-integrated arts lessons.

Through well-designed arts experiences, in concert with other district programs, BSSD attempts to reach and teach the whole student. We expect the arts to help our youth explore and express their understanding of what is important and beautiful in the world and learn to appreciate that art matters.

Savoonga students created these tiles as a part of their Artist In School experience that became part of a school mural.

New Art Program in Koyuk

By Robin Child

We have a new art program here in Koyuk, with a focus on creating art that reinforces and invigorates what students are learning in their core-content classrooms. One cross-curricular project that happened this month was the creation of "Cyanotypes" as part of a Botanical Art unit.

1st and 2nd graders making cyanotypes.

Cyanotype of Currant.

Cyanotypes was the first photographic process used by botanists to catalog plants. Using the abundant amount of sunshine we had last week, students of all grade levels created solar prints of different local plants.

Elder Georgianne Anasogak speaking to Junior High students.

"Ahyu" or Labrador Tea, botanical art by 7th grader.

In some of the elementary classes (3rd-4th and 1st-2nd in particular) students are bringing what they are currently learning in Science about plants and roots to the Art room to complete plant studies.

Cyanotype of Fireweed/Spruce.

2nd grade work.

In the 10th and 7th-8th grade classes, students have completed a series of botanical drawings of native plants to accompany their cyanotypes. To finish the unit, Koyuk elder, Georgianne Anasogak, came to speak to these classes about local plants to help students complete their studies, including recording their Inupiaq names, medicinal qualities and local uses.

Ed Tech Trip to Teller

By Janice Hamilton District Office

In early September, Josh Bullock and I arrived at the James C. Isabell School in Teller. As part of the BSSD Ed Tech Department, Josh and I travel to the BSSD schools and assist teachers with integrating technology into the classrooms. As a new teacher this year, Teller marked my first trip to a school once the BSSD school year had begun. Teller students made a wonderful lasting impression on us.

Immediately upon entering the school, we were greeted with smiles and offers to show us around the building. Several students approached us to introduce themselves with handshakes and words of welcome. As Josh and I explored the building, some students even recognized Mr. Bullock as a former math teacher at the James C. Isabell School.

The following morning, Josh and I attended the school-wide morning assembly. The principal, Susette Carroll, led the students, staff and faculty in morning stretches.

Students enjoying the morning warm-ups.

During our visit, Josh and I were able to work with several teachers and students. One opportunity that put smiles on all of our faces, was the chance to work with Jan Delaney's, or Ms. D's, 3rd and 4th grade students. Josh and I were quickly impressed with how much the more. Everyone in class had fun learning about Hawaiian flowers on the Internet and changing fonts and word colors in a word typing program.

appreciated the generosity and welcoming nature of the students and staff in Teller! I know I am looking forward to the chance to visit each school and work with the students and teachers in each location. What a great beginning to the school year!

Wales Makes Plunge Into Bering Sea

By Judy Standafer

Wales Kingikmiut School made AYP and to celebrate the staff had promised to jump in the Bering Sea. So starting off the school year with keeping that promise the staff made the plunge on the first day of school.

The staff agrees that is was very cold, but worth it. Asked if they would do it again, most said yes. "It not only took my breath away, but my voice," says Judy Standafer. Sherman Richard had planned on swimming for a bit, but once in the water he decided to just dive through a wave and get out.

Diomede Constuction Update

By Jori Grant

With the Diomede school still under construction we started the year off a little differently then previous years. The first day of school found the 3rd-high school students moving desks and chairs into brand new classrooms, while the K-2nd graders created a thank you poster for the hardworking construction crew.

SUPERINTENDENT'S CORNER By Rob Prou

In my career, I have never met a mother who did not want her child to be successful. I have unfortunately met many mothers who did not have the tools to help their children achieve success, and I have met far too many students who are failing because they have not learned the critical skills of reading and math in the primary grades. The Bering Strait School District is capitalizing on partnerships with the Department of Education and Early Development and the Alaska Staff Development Network in our efforts to help students gain the necessary skills in reading and math that provide the foundation of academic achievement. With funding from a School Improvement Grant and from a Graduation and Academic Improvement for Native Students Grant, we are implementing Rtl and AIMSweb. We are in the initial stages of implementation; however, preliminary results indicate that we are on the right path and that more of our students are having success with critical skill development.

Rtl is the process of organizing the adults in a school around the academic and behavior needs of children. AlMSweb is the universal screening and progress monitoring tool that provides the information needed to immediately make instructional decisions, before it is too late after a child has failed. At the base of the Rtl process is a solid, core program that is taught with fidelity: a guaranteed and viable curriculum. Rtl is emergency room education. An intervention team consisting of the teachers, the principal, and hopefully the parents diagnoses where the child is struggling and then provides an intervention plan that includes progress monitoring. One of the criticisms we hear of Rtl and of fidelity to a core program is that it takes the fun out of teaching. To which we respond, school is no fun to a child who can't read.

Preliminary Results from 2011 to 2012 SBA Assessments:

- 1. Shishmaref: Fifth Grade Math/ 23% to 79%
- 2. Savoonga: Third Grade Writing/37% to 65%
- 3. Gambell: Fourth Grade Reading/38% to 65%
- 4. Stebbins: Third Grade Reading/17% to 50%

Graduation Rate Over Two Years: 46% to 60%. Dropout Prevention Begins at Birth!

We obviously have much more work to do in order to ensure that all students are performing at grade level in reading and math. However, we are encouraged by our preliminary results. Students who are in the bottom quartile need explicit instruction that targets their individual and specific needs. They don't need their teachers to slow down. They need their teachers to speed up. Acceleration is the key to success with closing the gap for students performing below grade level expectations. We all want what is best for students, and we have some of the finest educators in the state of Alaska. An Rtl process gives teachers the protocol and the tools necessary for systemic and consistent instructional delivery that guarantees every child has an equal opportunity to learn.

The musk oxen use cooperation to protect their young from predators. When threatened by wolves, they "circle the wagons" and position themselves with their young in the middle and their sharp horns facing outward. What must we do to become like the musk oxen? How do we establish that sense of urgency, that instinct of survival? How do we protect our students? In the Bering Strait School District, we call it Response to Instruction: Rtl.

Successful Scores for Stebbins School

By Kaisa Tabor

For the first time ever in the history of Tukurngailnguq (Stebbins) School, Adequate Yearly Progress (AYP) was made

The SBA's and HSGQE are taken every year in the spring. The scores of the past have not reflected the hard work that the students, faculty, staff, and community have put in toward student achievement. According to No Child Left Behind (NCLB), Stebbins has been considered a low-performing school for the last nine years.

However, last year, history was made when Stebbins reached AYP across the board. Each school is graded in multiple categories, including: School as a Whole, Alaska Native Students, Economically Disadvantaged, SPED, English Language Learners, and Graduation Rate. We saw improvement in each of these categories which allowed us to reach our goal of making AYP.

This goal could not have been made without the help of many people. Our school mission statement is, "All of US working together for academic achievement to create respectful lifelong learners and community members." The key in that statement is ALL of US. Without the help of our community, staff, students, and the district office we would not have seen the improvement that we saw last year.

This year our goal is much the same. Stebbins School is well on its way to repeating that success. With our hard working faculty and staff, in-depth intervention programs, CHAMPS behavior system, engaged students, and supportive community, we will see another successful year.

Nome Nanooks volleyball team makes big statement in Homer

By Stephen Palmatier

If the Nome Nanooks volleyball team did not make you a believer in them yet, then perhaps now they will. Last weekend, the Lady Nanooks won their second straight tournament with a win in Homer. This comes off the previous weekend's performance in Anchorage, where the ladies won the lower bracket.

Last weekend's tournament included teams from Kenai, Seward and Skyview as well as the host, Homer. In the pool play matches to begin the tournament, the Nanooks won all of their matches in straight sets before losing the final one to Skyview in straight sets. In two of the matches, the ladies faced JV squads, which gave more opportunity for other girls to participate and get experience.

"I thought our team played hot and cold," said Lucas Frost, head coach of the Lady Nanooks.

After the pool play matches, the Nanooks were able to come away as the second seed, only having lost one match to Skyview. In their first game against the Homer JV, Nome had no trouble winning in straight sets, 25-17 and 25-18. Their next match was Homer's varsity, who the Nanooks had previously beaten three straight times. However, with Homer having the home court advantage in the tournament, this was more challenging for Nome than any match before. The crowd seemed to make an impact as Nome came out flat, dropping the first set 25-11 to Homer.

'The first set was disastrous for us. We were not ready for the tenacity that Homer showed. During that first set, there was not much that we were doing wrong, but rather Homer was just doing everything right," said Frost.

However, even with the first set disaster, the Nanooks were resilient as they have been much of this season so far, and they captured the second set, winning 25-22 and closed it out with a third set victory, 15-12.

"We played Nome-Beltz volley-ball instead of Homer volleyball," said Frost referring to those final two

In perhaps what was their best victory of the season, considering the circumstances down a set and facing the opponent's home crowd, the Nanooks carried the momentum into the championship game where they faced Skyview High School again. Skyview, who certainly were favored coming off their win against the Nanooks in pool play, made the Nome ladies eager for a little revenge. And the Nanooks were ready for the rematch as they were able to beat Skyview in straight sets, 25-20 and 25-22.

"They had become our nemesis having beaten us many times before, and the girls knew in their hearts that this was a team they could beat," said

Senior Taylor Pomeranz led Nome with 13 kills in the championship match, assisted by five blocks from senior Devynn Johnson and junior Ariana Horner.

"Pomeranz being the commanding senior really leads this team," said Frost. "She is able to lead the squad due to all of her teammates giving her great sets.'

Pomeranz, senior Dylan Johnson and Kathy Holly were all named to the all-tournament team after the matches. The Nome ladies, who carry two straight tournament victories from stiffer competition, look to carry their confidence and momentum back with them as they return to conference play heading to Bethel next weekend.

"Overall, it was a very good weekend. To watch those championship sets were so exciting, and to watch the girls rally with each other and play very smart was great. I was proud to be their coach," said Frost.

THE DOCK WALK

Fall is in the air in form of sea spray flung up from the angry ocean crashing against the seawall. Last week, a strong north wind pushed the water out and while the Nome beaches looked much wider, rough water was prevalent in Norton Sound. This calmed down harbor operations considerably. In her weekly Port of Nome report to the Nome Nugget, Harbormaster Joy Baker said that only one construction barge is left in the harbor, still loading construction equipment aboard as construction season winds down in Nome. Two landing craft arrived and departed Nome last week and Vitus Marine's fuel tanker Moor delivered more fuel. Not much else was moving due to the strong North wind, which howled with peak gusts in Nome on Sept. 26 with 49 mph. The low water, however, presents a different challenge for port users. As the water level rises again, boats' decks get caught in the fenders on the south and east fender walls and if the boat owner is not there to push the vessel away from the fender walls, the boats could be damaged. The fenders were installed by the Army Corps of Engineers, but their inadequate fender installations will be replaced soon. The port has the funding to remove the fenders and replace them with something that works better. The design of the new walls is almost done and invitations to bid on the project will go out next spring, says Baker.

The removal of the sunken barge Lulu – the project which began in the winter time with a completion date of September – has received an extension until June 2013.

"....Let us run with perseverance the race that is set before us, looking to Jesus the pioneer and perfecter of our faith, who for the sake of the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, disregarding its shame." Hebrews 12: 1

As an older man, my father told me a story. When he was about 12-years old, his father died. His mom had to move from the country farm back into a small town to find employment and raise her kids. They were poor and could not afford even shoes. He was used to being meanly teased by kids his age. One day at school he was running in track. He had the lead in a race. Directly behind him was the coach's son, gaining. Suddenly my dad felt searing pain. The boy behind him was wearing shoes with cleats. Those cleats dug into my dad's bare heels. It obviously was a formative moment because later at the age of 80, he could relay the story with details and a smile of satisfaction on his face. He had kept the race. He had persevered.

Some say adversity builds character. Scholars will say the best artists are those who have suffered and come through it, almost defiantly making a thing of beauty, proclaiming, "Life is good!" Paul says it this way in Romans 5: "...we also boast in our sufferings, knowing that suffering produces endurance, and endurance produces character, and character produces hope, and hope does not disappoint us, because God's love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit that has been given to us.'

So too, in our walk of faith we face adversity. The writer of Hebrews knew this. In Chapter 11 he reminds us that our ancestors struggled too. They did not always see results. But by faith, they kept trusting that God was at work. Abraham, Sarah, Moses, the list goes on, did not see the results of the promises God had given them. Moses saw the Promised Land only from a distance - after suffering through over 40-years in the wilderness and forging a people out of those who had been freed from Egyptian slavery. But he kept the faith. You and I know people like this too. They are our relatives. They are our ancestors. They are regular folk in our own personal histories and communities who kept the faith and inspire us

As we live in our families, work in our communities, we may not always see results. After all, we are living and working with people: flawed and corrupt every one. But we hear the call: " Run the race." God is at work in the invisible, making life out of death, redeeming his children. God is present in this human history using you and me.

"Now faith is the assurance of things hope for, the conviction of things not seen. (11:1) All of these died in faith without having received the promises, but from a distance they saw and greeted

Arsenic in your rice: Should you be concerned?

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

People have been asking about the safety of eating rice or giving rice cereal to their children after hearing reports that rice and rice products in the U.S. contain a potentially harmful element called arsenic.

All forms of rice, including white and brown rice, regular and organic, as well as rice cereals for children contain small amounts of arsenic according to joint reports from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and Consumer Reports made public last week.

Whether or not the findings are reason for concern is unclear. Arsenic is a poisonous element found naturally in the soil. It is odorless and tasteless. In high concentrations, it can cause abdominal pain, vomiting, diarrhea, blindness, numbness paralysis. Smaller exposures over time, typically in concentrations higher than found in the U.S. rice supply, increase a person's risk of bladder, lung and skin cancers. Arsenic is also thought to affect brain development in chil-

No one really knows the level at which arsenic becomes harmful. There is no federal limit for arsenic in food. The federal limit in public water supplies is 10 parts per billion (ppb) enforced by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). At this limit, a person would be exposed to 10 micrograms of arsenic for every liter of water consumed.

Compared to the EPA limit, the vast majority of the rice products tested by the FDA and Consumer Reports average between 3.5 and 6.7

micrograms of arsenic per serving. Some of the rice and rice products contained 10.4 to 11.1 micrograms of arsenic, slightly above the federal limit for water. Infant rice cereal, the first solid food commonly given to young children, contains the lowest concentrations of arsenic, well below the levels considered harmful to humans. The effect of this low-level arsenic exposure to developing brains is unknown.

The amount of arsenic in rice varies widely depending on the where the rice was grown. Generally nated with arsenic from these old pesticides that persist in the soil despite the fact that it has been decades since the contaminated pesticides were last used. Arsenic is still found in certain fertilizers and animal feed as well as in soil and water from natural sources.

The FDA states there is inadequate scientific data to recommend changes regarding the consumption of rice or rice products. In the coming months, the FDA will be testing up to 1,200 different forms of rice sold in the U.S.

While waiting for more evidence-based guidance, the authors at Consumer Reports give several recommendations for rice eaters: Rinse rice thoroughly before cooking. Cook rice with an increased amount of water, using 6 cups water to 1 cup of rice, and draining excess water after cooking. This may remove up to 30 percent of the arsenic from Parents should limit infant children to one serving of rice cereal daily. Cereals made with wheat, oatmeal or corn, which contain lower levels of arsenic, may be provide a good alternative.

Likewise, adults who eat rice as their preferred grain may consider experimenting with alternate equally healthy grains such as whole wheat, oats or millet.

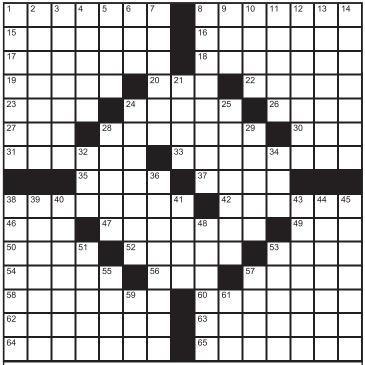

the highest concentrations were found in rice grown in Arkansas, Louisiana, Missouri and Texas. The level of arsenic does not depend on the type of rice, white or brown, organic or non-organic. The levels are high in the U.S. because, until it was banned in the 1980's, arsenic was used by farmers in pesticides. It is possible that the current rice supply may be contami-

Trooper Beat

On September 18, the Alaska State Troopers arrested James Walunga, 32, of Gambell after an investigation showed that he had violated conditions of his probation by consuming homebrew alcohol. James was later transported and remanded to Anvil Mountain Correctional Center in Nome.

On September 18, AST in Nome arrested Ernest Booshu, 21, of Gambell for an arrest warrant issued by the Nome court for Misconduct Involving Weapons in the 4th degree. Booshu was transported and remanded to AMCC

On September 25, at 7:28 p.m., AST received a report that David Slwooko, 41, and Debra Kimoktoak, 48, were overdue from Koyuk. The couple were to travel from Koyuk to Unalakleet via boat on September 24, and were due into Unalakleet on the evening of September 24, but never arrived.

They were traveling in a 17-foot aluminum magnum boat powered by a 75 horsepower Yamaha outboard. They had enough food for at least one day and had camping gear. The couple took two dogs with them, one white and one black. Search efforts by aircraft and one boat from Koyuk have been unsuccessful as of 10:00 p.m. on September 26. High winds and extremely low water have hampered search efforts. Searching will continue on the morning of September 27.

UPDATE On September 27, AST and a VPSO searching in a state aircraft during search efforts spotted an overturned boat east of St. Michael on the shore. The US Coast Guard H60 responded to the location of the boat for investigation and personnel discovered no signs of Slwooko or Kimoktoak or their dogs. The motor was detached but still connected to the boat by cables. Vessel identification numbers confirmed it was the boat used by Slwooko and Kimoktoak. An aerial shoreline search in the area failed to find any other signs of the missing. The next of kin for Slwooko and Kimoktoak have been advise of the discovery. At this time both Slwooko and Kimoktoak are presumed drawingd. A corch is continuing with local casets.

drowned. A search is continuing with local assets.

UPDATE On October 1, pending further leads leading to the whereabouts of David Slwooko, troopers suspended their search for Slwooko who is still missing after he and Debra Kimoktoak were reported overdue from a boating outing on the Norton Sound on September 25. On September 28, at approximately 4:14 p.m., troopers in Unalakleet were notified by a Bering Air helicopter pilot that a body was seen on the shore in a location approximately 30 miles south of Unalakleet and 26 miles east of St. Michaels. Troopers were able to travel via a Bering Air helicopter and retrieve Debra Kimoktoak's body from the shore and transport it to Unalakleet. Her body was sent to the State Medical Examiner's Office in Anchorage for an autopsy. Next of kin of both families were informed of the discovery. Troopers and local searchers continued over the weekend searching the coastline without finding Slwooko.

who asked Respondent to leave, both in the meeting room and in the hallway.

"When Yant [NPD police officer Michael Yant] entered the boardroom, Smith was standing and yelling.'

"Petitioner is afraid of physical injury or death to its directors and employees, because Respondent has engaged in a pattern of harassing behavior, has behaved in a physically threatening manner, and has made statements threatening violence against NSEDC employees."

"I believe Smith is a danger to me and to anyone affiliated with NSEDC."

The actions Kyan Olanna swore to in her perjured affidavit did not actually happen as anybody who wants to know the truth can easily determine by listening to the recording of the July 31 meeting on YouTube at:

http://youtu.be/dDETOB8DgZg The following is not on the

I did not become verbally abusive toward NSEDC board members. That's a lie.

I did not behave in a threatening manner toward Kyan Olanna. That's

I was not "yelling" at any time during the meeting on July 31. That's

I have never engaged in a pattern of harassing behavior, physically threatened or made statements threatening violence against NSEDC employees. Those are lies.

If any of those things had really happened and were not just lies, Kyan Olanna would have included some evidence with her complaint instead of only her unsupported statements, after all, she's a lawyer, she should have been taught in law school about the need for proving what she writes in court documents.

There were about 20 witnesses in the room including, my wife Rita Smith, Nome Nugget reporter Laurie McNicholas, ADF&G Area Management Biologist Jim Menard and NPD police officer Michael Yant.

The members of the NSEDC board of directors who were there, NSEDC President Janis Ivanoff and NSEDC Chairman Dan Harrelson all witnessed the events Kyan Olanna misrepresents and will now have to decide if they are also willing to commit perjury to support Kyan Olanna. It is going to be really interesting to see which path they take.

There are at least three audio recordings of the meeting. Mine is posted on YouTube for all to hear, NSEDC was recording the meeting as usual and Officer Yant also recorded what happened on his personal recorder. That's a lot of overlapping evidence. If any of what Kyan Olanna swore to was true, it would appear on the recordings, but it doesn't. If anything Kyan Olanna swore to was true, she would have identified where it appeared on the recordings and submitted a recording as proof that her statements were true but she didn't do that. That's because it's perjury.

Perjury is a Class B felony. Tim Smith Nome, Alaska 99762

THE RAIN ON TRAINS—Last week's rain and blow left the Solomon trains standing in a watery plain Oct. 5. The derelict but many-times photographed locomotives and wheel sets usually stand among the grasses of the tundra, not in the overflow of Safety Sound. A storm in 1913 derailed the rolling stock after they were brought from New York City to serve miners working the Solomon-Council area.

Leadership mulls Bering Strait Management Authority to deal with growing ship traffic through the Bering Strait

By Diana Haecker

The Institute of the North conducted a workshop last week in Kawerak Inc.'s boardroom in Nome to get input from regional leaders whether or not there should be such a thing as a Bering Strait Management Authority. Karlin Itchoak, Alaska program coordinator with the Institute of the North, led the workshop. Itchoak was born and raised in Nome, he said, and it irked him that a suggestion to create something like a Bering Strait Management Authority did not come from the Bering Strait region itself, but by an outsider. "During the Week of the Arctic, the suggestion came up to create such an authority, but it didn't come from the region, so I suggested we go to Nome and ask you: What do we need?" Itchoak said.

The question was how to ensure that the region has a voice in policies made as ship traffic and resource development heads for the Bering Strait and into the new, bountiful frontier of the Arctic. Among the workshop's attendees to wrap their heads around the immensity of the task at hand were Nome City Mayor Denise Michels, City Manager Josie Bahnke, Kawerak Inc. president Melanie Bahnke, Nome Eskimo's Mike Sloan, Northwest Campus' acting director Bob Metcalf, NSEDC fishery biologist Charlie Lean, Marine Advisory Program's Gay Sheffield, Kawerak VP natural resources Rose Fosdick, social studies scientist Dr. Lily Ray, Eskimo Walrus Commissioner Vera Metcalf, Marilyn Koezuna-Irelan, Roy Ashenfelter, NJUS manager John Handeland and two aids to Senator Donny Olson's and Representative Neal Foster's office. In the later part of the discussion U.S. Coast Guard Rear Admiral Thomas Ostebo and Capt. Greg Sanial joined the group, offering their perspective on growing ship traffic to the Arctic.

Council candidates to joust again in runoff vote Nov. 6

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Common Council expects the turnout for the runoff election on two Council seats to draw a better turnout than did the Oct. 2 municipal election. Voters will come to Old St. Joe's Hall to vote for Council candidates the same time as the poll for U.S. presidential candidates and state legislators on Nov. 6.

In its election canvass Oct. 4, the council declared a runoff election needed to determine final results. No Common Council candidate received a majority of the votes for seats "C" and "D"—50 percent plus at least one vote. The runoff election for these seats between the top two contenders for each will occur according to City law on Tuesday, Nov. 6, the day of the presidential election. The ordinance states that the runoff election must be on the first Tuesday of the month following the subject election to establish a winner. The high-vote getters for these

Council seats did not attain a major-

Preliminary figures showed incumbents Randy Pomeranz grabbing Seat C and Stan Andersen staying glued to Seat D, and the Nugget reported them as victors in their races. However, final figures did not beat the newspaper's deadline Tuesday. The final count of 779 ballots cast showed Randy Pomeranz receiving 314 votes (47.01 percent) for Seat "C" to Randy Oles' 197 votes, followed by Kenny Hughes holding third place with 152 votes. On Seat D. Andersen received 319 votes (48) percent) to challenger James West Jr.'s 221 votes, followed by Nikolai Alexander Ivanoff with 125 votes Utility board incumbents David Barron and Fred Moody, running unopposed, kept their seats. For school board seats, incumbent Betsy Brennan prevailed with 379 votes (57.16 percent) to challenger Monica

Ivanoff named to planning panel, Knodel honored

By Sandra L. Medearis

Mayor Denise Michels appointed Nikolai Alexander Ivanoff to the Nome Planning Commission at a regular meeting of Nome Common Council Oct. 8.

The Council unanimously ratified the mayor's appointment.

Ivanoff was the only applicant for a seat vacated with the resignation of Jeff Darling, according to Michels.

"I have a plan to continue to live in Nome and it will be a pleasure for me to serve the community from this public office," Ivanoff wrote on his application. Ivanoff recently ran for Council Seat "D" currently held by Stan Andersen, but did not prevail. He has worked for Alaska Gold Co. as land manager for 13 years.

In other business the Council unanimously voted into first reading five measures to revise last years budgets to square them for closing after discussion and final passage Oct 22

The Council waived fees on use of public buildings for two organizations' functions this month: a facility fee waiver of $2,225 for the Nome Rec Center for Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. 75th anniversary festivities on

Oct. 30, and use of the Mini Convention Center as a meeting place for the Kawerak Regional Wellness Forum to launch its annual PFD time safety patrols safety patrols.

Finally, the Council unanimously passed a resolution of appreciation for Councilwoman Mary Knodel's 12 years of service on the Council and numerous other public committees and boards, including Iditarod Trail Committee, Month of Iditarod Committee, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, Little League softball, Nome Lutheran Church Council and Sunday school, Northwest Campus Advisory Committee, Nome School Board, Nome Chamber of Commerce Board, several bank community boards, Nome Hospice Committee, State of Alaska Employment Board, Nome Visitors Association, Nome Centennial Planning Committee, Norton Sound Health Corporation Board, City of Nome Museum and Library Commission, Pioneer Igloo #1 and other organizations.

The resolution started out, "Whereas Mary and Howard Knodel arrived in Nome, Alaska on August 13, 1970, with Mary in a gray miniskirt and leather boots and Howard in a suit and tie . . ."

The Council meeting began at 7 p.m. and adjourned at 7:18 p.m.

Letters -

Dear editor,

I would like to thank the community of Nome for a very warm welcome this past week.

This letter, though concerns something else. I stopped in the office of radio station KNOM this week and could not help but notice how appropriate it is that it is the photo of former deejay and station manager Tom Busch that welcomes visitors into the office and watches over its daily activities. His was a voice made for radio, but that started much deeper than a set of vocal chords. His portrait shows the portrait of a welcoming smile born from a love of humanity that included all and excluded none. He had heartbreak and disappointment in his life, but I believe he navigated through those times by focusing on family and the sundry services he provided those who came within the orbit of his activities. He truly deserved the trust he

I considered Tom a friend and colleague. I was shocked and saddened two years ago this November when I heard of his unexpected passing.

Dear Editor. Hello out there.

There has been talk about what should be done about suicide-I think they need to address unemployment; I think it is one of the main causes of suicide. The only reason the government can say unemployment is down is because people have run out of Unemployment Benefits/Extended Unemployment Benefits, not because people have jobs. People run out of benefits, and since there are no extra jobs available, they wonder how they are going to afford their families, or feel depressed/worthless with no place to look for help. Unemployment did not go down, instead it went up. With jobs getting taken away by the government, instead of making jobs like the government said they would, people are starting to feel depressed/stressed out and contemplating suicide.

Another thing that might be a cause of the lack of our judicial system doing their job. We often see repeat offenders in the papers. And yet, they get out with hardly serving any time. So the repeat offenders think they can keep doing it and getting away with it. The law is not protecting the victims that way, they are enabling the offenders instead. Not only that, but they are doing things to people that they take into custody that is not justifiable under the law, and getting away with it, just because they can. So what is a person to think? How are they to feel? Who will take their side and stand up for them? What is the use of telling nothing will happen to the wrongful person – right? So where is the justice? Who can we turn to for help?

It does do a body good sometimes to see a person hired for their qualifications, instead of who they may be related to – that part gets tiring. You often see qualified people get turned down from a job and an unqualified relative get one of the positions offered. Or maybe they get the job because their spouse moved into the area, and maybe to keep that person in your company, you hire the other. In many of our books that is not a good enough reason, but it doesn't seem to matter. Just like those lying companies who say they will do mostly local hire, yet they bring 70 to 90 percent of the people from out of town. That sure isn't local hire.

If the legislatures/government wants to turn the economy around they could start by investing in seeds and sending them to all the villages. If I had access to enough money to be able to do that, that is what I would do. We all know potato, carrots, turnips, radish and a few other edible plants are sturdy enough to grow anywhere, so I buy seeds like that and send it out to the city or IRA offices. That way at least hopefully the towns would share with each other in the harvests and people would be fed.

Although, it does get to be a little disheartening when you try to welcome people into your home and they steal from you. Much less, keep coming back even if you ask them to leave, and taking stuff over and over again. That, even if you tell/write a complaint, nothing happens. Shame on the people who are doing it, those

Good-bye and Good Riddance

The old Wien Building is scheduled to be abated this week. Hurrah and Hallelujah! The butt-ugly eyesore and fire-hazard on the corner of Front Street and Division St. is coming down. After years and years of dereliction the structure will go. Perhaps some enterprising Nomeites can salvage a few splinters and sell them as relics of the true cross. Maybe a few untreated boards could be used to make a

Of course the Wien Building is not alone in the need for abatement. There are others that need to go and they have been on the abatement list for way too long. Most of the structures are fire hazards and public nuisances that serve no practical purpose for neither their owners nor the City. We need to be more aggressive in our abate-The space left vacant by the Wien Building could make a fine spot for additional city parking and a small pocket park with a few benches and a picnic table and some planters for local flora. The owners of the Wien Building lot should donate the land to the City. It would make amends for allowing the ugly Wien Building to be a blight on downtown and a wart on Nome's public face for too many years. They

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

The Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum continues the look back at the 1900 Nome Gold Rush with perspective from Wilfred A. McDaniel. Here is another excerpt from "Alaska Beckons" written by Wilfred in 1943. His love of Nome is quite evident in that his experiences in this exquisite land are still fresh in his mind four decades later. Last week Ed and Wilfred were mining fish as well as gold. The pump was sucking up tomcod and dumping them into the sluice box. This week their mining days are numbered...

Alaska Beckons By Wilfred A. McDaniel

The short days of October passed quickly, with a noticeable decrease in daylight, from day to day. From the continuous day light of summer to the long, dark nights of winter, the change is rapid.

Increasing cold came as the sun came southward, lowering slowly toward the horizon, as each day passed. Heavy freezes came during the longer nights and working hours were often shortened because of frost and ice in the pits. Thawing of the pump became necessary, and as the weather grew colder, to prevent damage, a complete draining of the water from pump and engine was required.

Owing to the fact that saltwater freezes at a lower temperature, mining on the beach continued for some time after the creek placers had shut down for the winter.

Our work went on during the shortening hours of sunshine, but the discomfort of working in the stinging cold, and accomplishing so little was disheartening. Even the gold lost its lure, and when icicles hung from the pump and sluice-boxes, and slush ice formed on the seepage water under foot, it was with no great reluctance that we stacked the sluices, after making the last cleanup, and gave King Winter undisputed

October 15th marked the end of the mining season. A record kept showed that we had worked almost eighty days of actual mining, and under the conditions during which this was accomplished, it seemed a real achievement! The mining season over, removal and storage of engine and pump was undertaken at once. This was found to be much easier now, for the hard, frozen beach made an ideal pavement and by aid of planks from the wrecked lighter, with pinch bars and rollers, the various heavy parts were placed safely back on the bench and wrapped in canvas, soon to be buried under the deep snows of winter.

With lowering temperatures, living and sleeping in the tent became an uncomfortable problem! The heavy cast-iron stove was now useless. During the summer it had been set up in a shelter attached to the tent, but its bulk and poor heating capacity made it unfitted for present conditions, and a sheet iron Yukon stove replaced it. While fire remained in the Yukon stove the interior of the tent would be dry and comfortable, but at night, after we had rolled in the blankets, the fire soon died out.

LOCAL

Water left on the stove at night would be ice in the morning, and our damp outer garments would be stiff with frost, but soon thawed after dressing!

Chief's Notes

By Nome Police Chief John J. Papasodora

Each week, I spend a fair amount of time reviewing the activity from the prior seven days. Though I am aware of the daily occurrences, this weekly review has a greater impact as it recaps all of the significant events for a single week of time. This is expressed in the media release that the readers see each week.

What is apparent is that alcohol plays a major role in almost every event that we respond to. From the intoxicated person on the street to the alcohol-fueled assault; alcohol plays a major role in the victimization in our community. In the media releases issued every week, the public sees the names of those who have been arrested or the details of a variety of cases that remain under investigation. What the public can't see is the real-time affects on 'the rest' of the victims.

In this week's release, there is mention of an intoxicated mother and her 12-year-old daughter who was upset by her mother's behavior. Though 'upset' is a term that fails to capture the essence of the situation, it seemed like an appropriate term for the basics of a media release. Perhaps words like traumatized or terrified would have been more sensational, but the fact is that no word(s) could make anyone who has not experienced what the daughter experienced, could ever relate to what she was going through. In this situation, the officers can only absorb the trauma and give support to these victims.

In another case, Officers responded to an intoxicated mother who was not caring for her 8-yearold daughter. In its wisdom, the Alaska Legislature made laws to protect youth. One of those requires that care-givers are not impaired by intoxicants unless there is a sober third party present. However, what did that 8-year-old endure before the police arrived to make sure she was properly taken care of?

Many would dispute that there is no cause for alarm here. However, having been in law enforcement for a very long time, I have had the opportunity to see the affects. Whether it is the berating comments; yelling; incoherent thoughts; physical violence or something as basic as the inability to provide for the basic safety needs of a child, it all has an effect. But where is the child to go?

Each week, Nome Police Officers respond to situations of family or 'domestic' violence. By definition, domestic equates to family. Nearly all of these events involve alcohol and many of these incidents involve children of all age ranges. These children are the 'other' victims; those who are caught in the middle and are powerless to change their circumstances. They are the ones who experience the pain of watching their parents fight; suffer injuries; and watch the fabric of all the things they care about being shredded before their eyes. They may see a parent go to jail and asks themselves 'Why?' only to find that they have no impact on the answer. And many times, they are so exposed to these behaviors that it becomes 'normal' to them, and thus continues the cycle of violence for another generation. The number of victims continues to toll, and the cycle never ends.

You would think that after absorbing trauma for a long time that police officers would cease to care. But that's not the case. Police Officers take an oath to serve and protect. That oath becomes a way of life. If somewhere during the course of a career, an officer is able to give another hope, or to change a bad situation into something positive, that makes it worthwhile. But alcohol inhibits our ability to make that impact.

Alcohol is not inherently a bad thing. But anything that is abused can become a bad thing particularly when it is a mind and behavior altering substance. Just take a moment to think before tipping back the bottle or having that next drink, 'Who is waiting at home and counting on me?' Remember the children. They are the unseen victims.

Bering Strait Management Authority

By now it is obvious to even the casual observer that traffic of the waterways in front of Nome has increased manifold. Itchoak said that the region should secure a seat at the table to have a say as governments both foreign and national - and multinational companies plot the development of the increasingly icefree Arctic. Since last Friday's event was held in a workshop format, arising questions outnumbered the answers. "I expected and actually hoped for more questions than answers," Itchoak said in the end. Should there be a Bering Strait Management Authority? Who has the authority to create such an Authority? What role would the authority play? Advisory? What would be its mission, objective and reason d'être? With existing agencies, groups and organizations, should there be yet another authority or advisory board? How else can the region improve communication with those entities and people that implement policies that affect the Norton Sound-Nome-Bering Strait region but who don't live here? How can the many local voices be united as one and be heard in far-off centers of power?

Melanie Bahnke pointed to duplicate efforts being made by the multitude of agencies and organizations with a keen interest for the Arctic. She referenced a brainstorm session last year with Kawerak and Inuit Circumpolar Council officials that dealt with much the same questions as were posed on Friday in the same boardroom. "There is the ICC, the Arctic Council, the Park Service, Senator Murkowski is now asking for an Arctic Ambassador, who do we tie all these separate efforts in so that there a not too many groups pursuing their own agendas but work all together?" Bahnke asked the group.

The session began with defining the region's strengths and weaknesses? Participants agreed that the region's people, cultures are a strength, the stable government, existing infrastructure with the port of Nome, the Nome airport and already well-functioning partnerships are in place. The area boasts productive biological habitat, migration routes for marine mammals and is lined with communities with expertise in hunting and survival in the harsh environment. But those are also the weaknesses. What if an oil spill happens by one of the supertankers floating by, spoiling in one incident the ocean and shorelines that subsistence cultures depend on? While the Coast Guard does work together with their Russian counterparts on search and rescue operations in the Straits and the international waters, a major spill would be a disaster. 'For the Arctic, there is an international S&R agreement in place and we coordinate with our russian counterparts all the time," assured U.S. Coast Guard Capt. Greg Sanial. "A great challenge, however, is the availability of resources." Not only dramatic things such a sunken ship are a threat. John Handeland added that waste dumped over the side of ships far offshore is one of his concerns. "We can't have all these folks up here being unchecked in what they do. It's a big open ocean out there and we don't know what kind of waste is dumped into the water there?" Handeland said.

What is needed?

Except for creating an Alaska Arctic Policy commission, with

Nome Mayor Denise appointed as one commissioner, the Alaska state administration and Legislature is not emerging to position Alaska as a key player in shaping policies regarding Arctic access. While the first exploration drill ships headed to the Chukchi Sea and Beaufort Sea this summer, the state only know begins to research a possible Arctic Policy, something that the United States already have in place. A lone champion for Arctic issues is Lt. Governor Mead Treadwell, who is engaged and cognizant of what is at stake. The intergovernmental Arctic Council, currently under Swedish chairmanship, is the political entity that emerges in a leadership role and the United States is about to assume the chairmanship role come 2013. The stated interest of the U.S. is "National security, economic development and scientific research are important U.S. interests in the region. U.S. Arctic policy emphasizes environmental protection, sustainable development, human health and the role of indigenous people." However, a regional entity to help protect the interests of the local people inhabiting the shores of the Bering Strait and Norton Sound is non-existent. The International Maritime Organization is currently developing a Polar Code and Rear Admiral Ostebo said that the Coast Guard is stressing in those discussions that the Bering Strait needs an international scheme of traffic. "We ought to have basic traffic separation scheme," Ostebo told the group. "It would be good to have basic weather forecast and a system to notify people when there is a situation. It's all a slow process due to the international involve-ters go out to from shore to three miles, a zone that is easy to patrol and enforce state and U.S. laws. Things get more difficult for the Coast Guard beyond the state and territorial waters up to 12 nautical miles out. A so called exclusive economic zone exists up to 200 nautical miles where a country has the authority to regulate, manage or control certain laws, but cannot prevent or control ships from so called "innocent" passage.

Amid the discussions, Charlie Lean remarked that there seems to be an urgency for development and yet most basic questions haven't been answered or preventions measures put in place. Infrastructure like the Nome hospital are only on first glance an asset, because the existence of a regional hospital built for the needs of the region only gives a false sense of security. Charlie Lean spoke of his experience as long time ambulance volunteer. "As Ambulance Chief I was constantly worried about a mass casualty event, such as an airplane going done. I doubt that we could handle a mass casualty event stemming from a ship disaster," he said. Vera Metcalf, Eskimo Walrus

Commissioner informed the group that the five marine mammal commissions (Alaska Nanuuq Commission, Eskimo Whaling Commission, Bowhead, Beluga, Ice Seal and Eskimo Walrus Commissions) just recently formed the Alaska Marine Mammal coalition in September to develop recommendations that will be passed on to the Coast Guard, and through them to the IMO.

Workshop discussions ended with a frank look at the basic question. Does the region actually need a Bering Strait Management Authority? Some participants didn't like the name, others were on the fence if the situation warrants yet another organization. John Handeland said he's undecided if it's such a great idea. Others weren't sure, either, but stated that some entity needs to function as the bullhorn to broadcast the unified voice of Bering Strait and Nome residents to the powers to be.

Ostebo volunteered his opinion and said that this area needs to figure out what it wants, pick a concern and work on a solution. "Everywhere I go, I hear the same thing: "We don't know what's going on, we are afraid of the environment getting spoiled, and by the way, will there be economic development? Well, we want to be part of that.', "Ostebo said. We can't solve world hunger, but however the Coast Guard can help, we would like you to focus on one problem and solve it. Want AIS? Good, get it done." Ostebo said. AIS stands for Automatic Identification System, an automatic tracking system used on ships and by vessel traffic services to identify and locate vessels by electronically exchanging data with other nearby ships and AIS base stations.

Karlin Itchoak ended the workshop, saying that the results would be shared with the Coast Guard, U.S. Corps of Engineers, the Congressional delegation, Alaska public officials and the Alaska Arctic Policy

Police investigate woman's death

The Nome Police Department are investigating the death of 27-year old Karina Kugzruk of Nome. Nome Police Chief John Papasodora said that on Sept. 30, Kugzruk was brought to the Norton Sound Regional Hospital and it was reported that she has taken an undisclosed amount of prescription medications. Papasodora said that the police treats the case as a death investigation. He said police rule out foul play but are suspecting that Kugzruk died of an overdose of the medication, whether accidental or intentional is not known.

Nome man sentenced to 20 years for attacking woman

Al Roby Ahnangnatoguk, 55, was sentenced to 20 years flat and is not eligible for discretionary parole, ruled Superior Court Judge Ben Esch last Friday.

Ahnangnatoguk pleaded guilty to one count of assault in the first degree with a dangerous weapon. The charge stemmed from August 21, 2011, when Ahnangatoguk attacked his sister Brenda Ahnangnatoguk with an ulu and a gun. The woman was found in front of her residence on Fourth Avenue, bleeding from multiple cut wounds and a gunshot wound. According to police reports, Al Roby Ahnangnatoguk fled the scene with a rifle in hand and went to the Norton Sound Regional Hospital for treatment of cuts and a selfinflicted gunshot wound.

As the struggle still went on, two witnesses tried to help Brenda Ahnangnatoguk who managed to run out of her residence and away from the aggressor. Both witnesses felt threatened when Al Roby Ahnangnatoguk pointed a rifle at them before he fled toward the hospital.

Original charges included attempted murder in the first degree, two counts of assault in the first degree and three counts of assault in the third degree. In a plea bargain agreement reached in March, Ahnangnatoguk pleaded guilty to one count of assault in the first degree and was last Friday sentenced to serve 20 years in prison.

Symposium to address Chinook fishery disaster in Alaska

By Laurie McNicholas

The Alaska Department of Fish & Game will host a Chinook Salmon Symposium featuring scientific presentations and panel discussions in October 22-23 at the Egan Center in Anchorage. The symposium will run from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. both days in the center's LaPerouse hall. Extremely weak Chinook salmon returns occurred in several areas of Alaska this year.

The goal of the event is to discuss gaps in knowledge of Chinook salmon abundance and productivity and assemble a targeted list of research priorities to fill the gaps. A draft analysis of knowledge gaps developed by ADF&G scientists will be issued prior to the symposium so presenters, panelists and the public can review them and provide constructive input on the research recommendations.

An ADF&G announcement on the department's website says more details about this event will be forth-

Injury Prevention Program

The cool, crisp nights and shorter days remind us that fall is here in Western Alaska. As the nights grow longer, we need to remember safety! Our main concern we face every year is visibility, or simply BEING SEEN. As we commute to work and school our dark mornings prevent drivers, including 4-wheel drivers, from seeing pedestrians on the dark

Let's prevent injury and increase visibility! To make drivers see you, remember these tips:

• Use Reflective Tape: Reflective tape is the best way to be seen. A person wearing reflective tape can be seen by drivers as far as 500 feet away! Reflective tape options: sewon, iron-on, and there are also reflective stickers available.

• 360° Visibility: Place reflective tape on the front, back, left side and right side of your coat, jacket, and backpack to be seen by drivers in all directions.

• Walkers/Runners: Carry a flashlight while walking in the dark or use a safety strobe, the blinking light, to increase visibility.

• Drivers: Be aware of pedestrians during dark hours. Be extra cautious while driving in the morning hours, especially when children are heading to school. Also remember, with snow and ice covering the streets, stopping suddenly for children may be impos-

DOCKING - Canadian research vessel Polar Prince is docked next to Russian research boat Geo Arctic, far right, as the Canadian ship Sir Wilfred Laurier is anchored outside the Nome port.

THE DOCK WALK

The knocking on the door last week didn't come from visitors trying to get in, it was the wind and wind-driven rain that viciously pounded against Front Street business doors. The storm, harbinger of the fall season, kept ship traffic low last week.

Harbormaster Joy Baker reported that things are starting to wrap up at the harbor as temperatures plummet and the first frost has been covering local ponds.

A construction barge finished loading up construction equipment no longer needed for the season. It left Monday, Oct. 1 before the storm whipped up the ocean.

Also coming through Nome last week, were four landing crafts, which wrapped up nearly all village deliveries for the season. Waiting out the weather were two lighter fuel barges making more shoreside fuel transfers. Three sailing vessels departed south after the storm on Saturday, Oct. 6.

The tanker vessel Moor, the Canadian research boat Polar Prince and the Japanese research ship Mirai were anchored outside the harbor.

The Russian research and survey vessel Geo Arctic and the Polar Prince moved to dock on the causeway on Sunday Oct. 7. (See picture above).

They were spending a few days working on equipment and gear, as well as changing the crew and boarding science personnel.

Baker reports that some vessels have been pulled out of the water and are stored on land, but plenty remain in the water.

There is a rumor that the port is closing on Oct. 15, but it is false, said Baker. It's Mother Nature that dictates when the harbor freezes up and when the boats need to come out of the water, she said.

"Our nightly temperatures below freezing is the obvious sign that the harbor will freeze soon," Baker said.

2012 Norton Sound commercial salmon harvest offered a mixed bag of results

The following summary of the 2012 Norton Sound commercial salmon fishing season is adapted from a report by Jim Menard, area manager, Norton Sound and Kotzebue, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game. Menard's 19-page report is posted on the ADF&G website.

Norton Sound salmon harvest levels varied by species and commercial subdistrict this year. As forecasted, there was no commercial fishing directed at Chinook salmon in Norton Sound for the seventh consecutive season and no directed sockeye salmon fishery in the Port Clarence district for the fourth year in a row. In fact, the Chinook salmon run in the Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistricts was the worst on record.

The commercial chum salmon harvest was the eighth highest harvest since 1986. There was significant market interest in pink salmon in 2012, and commercial harvests were the largest since 1998. However, the coho salmon harvest was below average except for the Norton Bay subdistrict, which recorded its second highest coho salmon harvest. The reduced coho salmon harvest was largely the result of persistent severe weather and high surf conditions that kept fishermen on the beach throughout August.

Good dock prices for salmon resulted in an ex vessel value of $758,908, the sixth consecutive season in which salmon fishery value has exceeded $500,000 in Norton Sound.

Chinook (king) salmon

Escapement goals for Chinook salmon were not achieved for the second straight season on the Unalakleet River despite an early closure to Chinook salmon subsistence and sport fisheries. Escapement at the North River tower for the 2012 season was 996 Chinook salmon, the third lowest complete count on record. Final escapement at the Unalakleet River weir was 766 Chinook salmon, which was well below the 1,021 and 1,113 Chinook salmon enumerated during the 2010 and 2011 seasons, respectively.

The commercial harvest of chum salmon in Norton Sound totaled 62,772 fish. Harvests fell below the 100,000 plus fish seasons of 2010 and 2011 largely due to a lack of directed chum salmon fishing in the Golovin Bay and Elim subdistricts. Harvests may have exceeded the forecasted range of 70,000-100,000 chum salmon had there been ample tendering capacity to support concurrent chum and pink salmon fisheries in the Norton Bay subdistrict. As expected, the Norton Bay, Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistricts in southern Norton Sound accounted for 91 percent of the chum salmon harvest in 2012.

The cool spring led to late runs of chum salmon in southern Norton Sound, which made ascertaining early run strength difficult. However, it was apparent by early July that southern Norton Sound chum salmon runs were exhibiting good strength. Good subsistence catches of chum salmon were reported in the Norton Bay, Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistricts. Chum salmon escapements were incrementally building by the first week of July, as indexed by the Inglutalik River tower and Unalakleet River weir counts.

Chum salmon escapement goals in most chum salmon producing drainages of northern Norton Sound were not achieved in 2012. However, the 2012 Niukluk River escapement of 19,672 chum salmon should be considered a minimum count because the project was inoperable for 9 days due to multiple flood events. In the Elim subdistrict, the 2012 Kwiniuk River chum salmon escapement (5,499) was a record low for the tower project. However, the blockage to the channel connecting Moses Point to Kwiniuk Inlet could have prevented large numbers of Kwiniuk River chum salmon from reaching their natal spawning grounds. Unfortunately, the Tubutulik River could not be surveyed to assess relative abundance of chum salmon escapement in this drainage because of poor viewing conditions during the peak chum salmon spawning stage.

In the Nome subdistrict, excellent marine subsistence catches of chum salmon were reported in late June and early July, but weir counts of chum salmon lagged at the Snake River and Nome River weir projects. Aerial surveys were conducted in mid-July of the eastern Nome subdistrict drainages (Flambeau, Eldorado, and Bonanza rivers) and Sinuk River in the western Nome subdistrict. Several thousand chum salmon were observed on these surveys in the lower reaches of these drainages. By July 12, the Eldorado River weirbased chum salmon sustainable escapement goal range of 6,200 to 9,000 chums was projected to easily be reached.

Based on this assessment data, management biologists were able to project that the subdistrict-wide biological escapement goal would be achieved. Consequently, chum salmon subsistence gillnet fishing proceeded on the standard freshwater and marine schedules for the remainder of the season. Several beach seining opportunities were also issued via emergency order to increase the efficiency of subsistence chum and pink salmon harvests during optimal drying weather periods.

Pink salmon

The 2012 Norton Sound commercial pink salmon harvest totaled 205.498 fish. Southern Norton Sound subdistricts accounted for 59 percent of the overall harvest.

The harvest was well below the 500,000 to 600,000 pink salmon desired by the industry to satisfy the floating processor vessel in 2012. However, pink salmon catches were above average for most periods fished. Directed pink salmon periods were limited in 2012 due to chum salmon conservation concerns in the Golovnin Bay and Elim subdistricts, competing market interest for chum salmon in the Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistricts, and limited tendering capacity until mid-July to allow for prosecution of concurrent chum and pink salmon directed fisheries in the Norton Bay, Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistricts.

Pink salmon escapements in 2012 were well below long-term, evennumbered year average escapements. However, all Norton Sound pink salmon escapement goals were easily achieved, and surpluses were more than sufficient to support subsistence needs and commercial har-

Coho (silver) salmon

The 2012 commercial coho salmon harvest totaled 37,056 fish, well below the preseason catch forecast of 60,000 to 90,000 coho. The Norton Bay subdistrict recorded its second highest coho harvest of 4,378 fish, but harvests in all other subdistricts were below their recent 4- or 5year and long-term (1979-2011) average harvests. Southern Norton Sound subdistricts accounted for 93 percent of the coho catch.

The decrease in commercial coho salmon harvests this year can mostly be attributed to weather during August, rather than abundance. For example, coho salmon harvests in the Norton Bay subdistrict through Aug. 11 were well above average, but fishing was precluded by high surf conditions from Aug. 15-22

The Shaktoolik subdistrict, a major contributor to coho salmon harvests, was hit especially hard by southerly storms, and fishing was not possible for three periods between July 25 and Aug. 19. High surf conditions diminished for only brief periods during many scheduled openings in August, which caused several permit holders to lose interest and pursue other endeavors. The few brief fishable weather windows in August made it extremely difficult for the buyer to plan logistics for buying operations in remote subdistricts.

Precipitation in late July led to flood events that knocked out most Norton Sound escapement projects for several days, particularly in northern Norton Sound. The flooding made it impossible to accurately assess coho salmon abundance in northern Norton Sound in early August because so few coho were counted before the high water event.

Sockeye (red) salmon

The Pilgrim River subsistence net fishery was closed from July 20 to Aug. 5 until results of an aerial survey projected the sustained escapement goal of 4,000-8,000 sockeyes would be reached. Despite the closure, the preliminary subsistence harvest based on 111 permits returned from the Pilgrim River is 552 sockeves, which is 55 percent above the 2011 harvest of 356 sockeyes. However, the 2012 preliminary harvest is 596 percent below the 2003-2008 average harvest of 3,846 sockeyes when record runs occurred. Sockeye salmon subsistence harvest data for the Nome subdistrict and Port Clarence district were not yet available when this report was issued.

In 2012, an estimated 1,636 sockeye salmon were counted at Glacial Lake weir, and 7,117 sockeye salmon were enumerated at the Pilgrim River weir. The Glacial Lake weir count in 2012 was similar to the 1,697 sockeyes counted in 2011. The 2012 Pilgrim weir count would likely have been higher had the weir been fish tight during the entire target operational period.

Kotzebue chum harvest

The 2012 catch of 227,965 chum salmon in Kotzebue Sound trailed last year's catch of 270,343 chum salmon, but was still the fourth highest in 20 years, reports Menard. He said 83 permit holders sold chums to the major buyer, Greater Pacific Seafoods, compared to 89 permit holders last year.

The price per pound for chum salmon dropped from 40 cents per pound in 2011 to 32 cents per pound this year, which may have been a factor in the number of permit holders fishing this season, Menard added.

Lady Nanooks battle for victories in Bethel

by Stephen Palmatier

The Nome Lady Nanooks volley-ball squad, on a high as they are coming off two tournament victories in West Anchorage and Homer, headed back to conference play last weekend in Bethel to take on the host Lady Warriors and Hooper Bay. On paper, it looked like easier matches than the previous weeks for the ladies, but they had to scratch and claw their way to three straight victories.

With the one match against Hooper Bay, things seemed ordinary for the Nanooks as they cruised their way to a straight set victory, winning 25-9, 25-4, and 25-3. With Hooper Bay not being nearly the caliber of the Nanooks, the ladies had no trouble taking them down. All was not the case however for the host Bethel Lady Warriors.

Nome beat the Lady Warriors with little problem at home earlier in the season, but last weekend they had to come back from behind in many sets to win both matches. In the first match, the Lady Nanooks won 25-23, 25-13, and 25-21 and in the second match the following night, they won 25-19, 25-23, and 25-20.

The Bethel Lady Warriors, who played in front of their home crowd, seemed to get a boost of energy with the support. And not only that, but they got four varsity players back from ineligibility, this made the Bethel squad much stronger as a whole.

"Their offense is a little bit different than other teams," said Lucas Frost, head coach of the Lady Nanooks referring to Bethel's style of play. "Our defensive setup was not prepared for their kind of offense."

Like Homer the previous weekend, the Lady Nanooks nonetheless showed that they can win in a hostile environment. Frost admitted after the game that the crowd definitely affected his team's performance.

"The girls really ran into a loud and rowdy crowd in Bethel. The pressure certainly increased for them due to the noise," said Frost.

Over the weekend, senior Devynn Johnson had perhaps her best games of the season, coming up with a team high 18 kills and adding key blocks as well. The same could be said for junior Ariana Horner who added 10 kills of her own. Kathy Holly was also solid once again with eight kills.

With the ladies now having not lost a match in nearly three weeks and losing only a handful of games all year, the Nanooks prepare for perhaps their biggest conference match of the season against the Barrow Whalers at home this coming weekend. With Barrow having beaten the ladies last year, this game will be a chance once again behind their home crowd's support to demonstrate to people how good their squad really is, now only a few weeks until the regional and state tournaments. What the ladies have been able to do out of the region so far this season has been great and eye-opening, but with this match, against a conference rival, this would be what Coach Frost and most of the girls would say would be their biggest game yet.

Nome wrestling team kicks off season at home

By Stephen Palmatier

With the cross-country runners done running their miles, a new team has stepped into the spotlight for the fall, the Nome Nanooks wrestling squad. The Nanooks kicked off their season right in their own backyard at the Den of the Mighty Nanooks last weekend, where teams from Kotzebue and Bethel joined the Nanooks in the Nome Invitational.

In what was a two-day tournament of non-stop wrestling, the Nanooks looked to be starting off the right way in some of the weight classes, while in other ones still needing to improve. In the Junior High championships, the Nanooks did not get a champion in the four different weight levels.

In the 99-pound weight class, Trevor Hickerson of Kotzebue was the champion.

In the 110-pound level, the champion was Brandon Evans of Bethel.

Bethel and Kotzebue also got the other two champions with Carl Charlie of Bethel winning the 129-pound class and Louis Edenshaw of Kotzebue taking the 158-pound class.

In the Senior circuit of things, the High School level, the Nanooks were much stronger over the weekend, receiving two champions and a runner up finisher. In the 106-to-113-pound level, Gage Hoffman of Bethel was the champion defeating Bobby Pate of Nome in 46 seconds with a pin. In the 113-to-120-pound class, the winner was Brett Reich of Kotzebue over Carlie McIntyre of Bethel in a pin of three minutes and 48 seconds.

In the 126-to-132-pound weight class, the winner was last year's state champion from Nome, Emery Booshu, who took the title over Josh Mendenhall of Bethel in an 11-4 decision.

In the 138-pound class, the champion was James Horner of Nome, who won over Jeremiah Gallahorn of Kotzebue with an 11-5 decision. Both Nome champions got huge support from the home crowd as they wrestled in the three rounds of the match. The remainder of the levels were Edwin Haviland of Kotzebue defeating Ben Phillips of Kotzebue in the 145-pound class, Noah Roetman of Kotzebue beating Koy Johnson of Kotzebue in the 152-pound class, Brayton Lieb of Bethel defeating Josh Roetman of Kotzebue in the 160-pound class and Trevor Chavez of Bethel defeating Devan Phillips of Kotzebue in the 170-pound weight class

Bethel and Kotzebue seem to be the dominant teams in all-around finishes and the Nanooks have a lot of work to do for the upcoming season. But with the two championships in Booshu and Horner, the Nanooks certainly have something to build off of with. The Nanooks will look to gain even more success in their next match when they head to Kotzebue for the Bush Brawl in two weeks.

enjoyed sewing, beading, crocheting, reading, doing puzzles and planting flowers in the tee pee and going to bingo.

Maggie truly loved her family. When spending time with family and friends Maggie loved to laugh and make people happy. She would send all kinds of subsistence food she gathered to her sisters and brothers. Maggie died September 20, 2012 in Nome from liver cancer. Maggie will be dearly missed by her family and friends.

Maggie is survived by her lifelong companion Alfred (Papa) Sahlin, sons Larry and wife Lulu Clark, and Michael Clark of Anchorage; granddaughters Sidonia Drew of Washington State, Tiffany and husband Anthony Shield, Heather Penetac, Stephanie Koezuna, Sara, Kimberly and Minnie Clark; grandson Kyle Clark; great-grandsons Maddox Drew and Blaze Shield; sisters Molly Judd of Las Vegas, NV, Clara Beckmen of Vancouver, WA, Carol Elvsaas and Myrtle Komakhuk of Anchorage; brothers Kenneth and Sammy Komakhuk of Anchorage; Edward Komakhuk of Hawaii and Jonathan Komakhuk of Nome.

CLEANUP — Bethany Daniels, Kristen Daniels, Mallory Conger just finished cleaning up the city's snow dump site. The girls are members of the Nome Ski and Biathlon team. They raise their funds by contracting with the City of Nome to cleanup the snowdump site. In September and October the team tackled the huge job and in a five-day span, they filled and moved over 110 bags of trash, along with countless large pieces of debris.

things cost other people money. If you want something like that – go make the money to buy it – not steal it. I'm just glad I'm not you when it comes time to answer to God.

Yea, its duck hunting and moose season again. I know I've been pretending to hunt, lots of fun. Remember, its getting colder, so please dress accordingly, never know when you might get stuck somewhere. And take extra grub. Don't forget – the elders would like a taste.

Take care you all. God bless you. As always,

Dear Editor:

My name is George Olanna, Sr. currently living at Nome. I have one son George Olanna Jr. who is being held at AMCC without evidence and denied of his rights by the Defense Attorney of Nome. He was denied by the attorney to appoint someone as Power of Attorney, access to his arrest reports (He recently got the records) denied bail bondsman and bail hearing, among other rights.

They are using mostly the doctor's report for evidence when the doctor was not there as a witness. His report should have included the well being of the victim.

I left $60 for him a couple weeks ago. He was given $7. I called. The lady said she'd call me back unable to find the records. I said I watched him put the money away. She called back later to tell me that $7 was for his health care. I said we have Native health. No word. I said I'd look into it. No word. Later they called to say he will be given $53 but will have to wait for 10 days. I called again. I told them that this was not government money but my money for my son. They finally gave him the money. One guy came in with over $1,000. He came out with less than 200. One came out with over $600 when he did not have anything. The Law had mistreated Natives for many years.

The lady who was hurt says he did not harm her. There is no evidence. He was completely blacked out when he was arrested and has no memory of it. He called me from the cop car. I immediately told him not to say anything anymore until he has attorney. He said he was accused of stabbing someone or something of that nature. I stopped him from talking knowing the cops may be there. He listened to me and said he will call me. My son listens to me all the time. He is my only son and we stayed together all of his life until three years ago when I moved to Shishmaref.

I was calling for attorneys when I called one of the defense attorney staff unknowingly he was one of them. He said Jr. does not deserve bail bondsman when alcohol was involved. Well, if he was appointed power of attorney, defense attorney denied he would have help. He wants help and treatment. I was a counselor for youth facilities and know what alcohol can do. Sometimes it takes a person to hit the bottom to learn. This is exactly what is happening to my son. He has not been drinking for over a year but peer pressure was strong.

Last week his hearing was set for 1:30 p.m. It was held at 8 a.m. They woke him up for the hearing. He was never told they changed the time. We had planned to say something but were not informed. He is being denied of his rights.

One of the attorneys told me after looking at his records that someone is trying to draw a bad picture of Jr. and will take time and money to clear his name. One friend emailed me she was accused like Jr. is. It took her three years and $15,000 to clear his name. This was by the law.

My son is illegally indicted without evidence and hearsay and witnesses who were there drunk as well. They had a party. There were others around. The lady said Jr. did not harm her. Someone knows out there. Why was my son arrested and charged?

My goal now is to investigate the Nome Law including AMCC. Since then people wrote to me in email and calls that they were abused by the Law. One was taken from a village to Nome for murder. He was held for a week without information and was released. One was poured booze all over his body from a bottle and taken to jail. There are more stories. One lady had written a letter to Senator Don Olson on the same subject. I wrote a letter to him and other senators. We need to stop this abuse. Please help to stop abuse and mistreatment of Natives. Don't be afraid to come out. I know lot of young people and parents are afraid to say anything. They could be target by the law

We finally will have my son on Monday. We have the bail money. We also know that there are people who were released on Saturdays. My son has to wait for Monday. His rights are being denied.

Thank you to Toby from Wales for donating money.

Thank you for your help support. I sure need to set my son free.

As of 9-24 he's home with his family. Little Helen did not want to leave him. He's cooking for his family—caribou and baby bearded seal.

The cops and the Law should able to respect people they serve. The cops are supposed to be professionals like teachers.

This is who I am. Sincerely,

George Olanna, Sr. Shishmaref, AK

To the Nome Nugget,

This is regarding gold dredges and miners' impact on our neighborhood. Since I was one of the leading people who organized testimony and filed both pictures and letters on behalf of the Snake River and Belmont Point neighbors I have been asked repeatedly how we are doing since the city hearings and actions. This letter is an update on how we have done this year to date. While we appreciate what the city, port officials and employees have done, it has still fallen on community members to police this area.

First, some dredges are being used as live aboard boats hardly ever moving and dumping waste in the river. Second, miners continue to repeatedly park and drive equipment in the subsistence and child play area even driving through the children when playing destroying several bikes this year on purpose. The bicycle pictured is one of several destroyed this year. Miners have gone out of their way to make noise with vehicles

Did you wash your hands?

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

As we enter the cold and flu season, it is worth a reminder that there is a proven method for stopping the spread of many diseases: Wash your hands.

According to the U.S. Center for Disease Control and Prevention, hand washing is the number one way to prevent the spread of infectious disease.

The ancient world knew that washing hand was important. Many cultures prescribed specific rituals for washing the hands. They connected hand cleansing with reducing the spread of illness even though the cause of infectious disease would not be discovered for several thousand years.

By the mid-1800s this common sense had been lost on most medical schools where students would routinely go from the anatomy lab to take care of patients in the wards without washing their hands. Patients sometimes died from infectious diseases that we now know were caused by bacteria transferred from the hands of these students.

In 1847, an astute Hungarian doctor named Ignaz Semmelweis proved that women in his obstetrical ward did not die from "childbed fever" when medical students washed their hands before examining the patients. Semmelweis was highly ridiculed by colleagues of his day, and it would be nearly 50 years before his methods wound with unwashed fingers.

We have come a long way when it comes to hand washing expectations.

LOCAL

According to the American Society for Microbiology and the American Cleaning Institute, in a nationwide study, 85percent of Americans wash their hands when using public restrooms.

Health care professionals are expected to wash their hands before touching a patient.

Soap dispensers in restrooms, sanitizer dispensers in public areas, and sign reminders to wash your hands have made hand washing an expected norm, not only in hospitals or medical clinics, but also in every restaurant, restroom, workplace, and household.

But there is room for improvement. Only 39 percent of Americans regularly wash their hands after coughing or sneezing. Hand washing is important in

Before preparing or eating foods, inserting contact lenses, giving med-

After touching raw meats, changing diapers, caring for a sick person, handling garbage, handling money, playing with animals, coughing or sneezing into the hand or whenever the hands appear soiled.

Hands should always be washed after using the restroom. For what it's worth, when I was in medical school. I noticed the infectious disease doctors always washed their hands before and after using the rest-

Children should be taught to wash their hands after playing with shared toys or after playing outdoors.

Effective hand washing involves scrubbing the hands and fingers for about 20 seconds with soap or an alcohol-based hand sanitizer. According to experts at the Mayo Clinic, antibacterial soaps are unnecessary for routine washing. Exclusive use of antibacterial soaps may even lead to resistant bacterial strains.

Rinse well with water and use a clean towel, when possible, to turn off the faucet and open the bathroom of hand washing would become common place in the medical community.

This cough and cold season be a part of the solution, not the problem, by washing your hands and thereby stopping the spread of bacteria and viruses. Now take 20 seconds to go wash your hands.

with no mufflers some driving intoxicated at high speeds even driving several times in front of the Prospect Place apartments during a drinking party while as many a dozen vehicles and over 30 miners congregated to wash and process their dirt and sand which they do on a weekly basis. The processing of their mining dirt and sand into our river in front of our fishing and recreation area could be done in a commercial area or on West beach where it belongs. We do tell port employees but their comment is well we didn't see it so we can't do anything about it?

The miners repeatedly drive vehicles with no registration no insurance and no respect for rules of the road driving from the dredge parking area beach on the Snake directly into oncoming traffic on Prospect Place some without even looking and others just think they have right of way.

Many vehicles are unsafe mechanically and Nome residents would not be allowed to operate such vehicles? A section of Prospect Place road at the entrance has been ruined and will erode this winter/spring due to 4-wheelers racing off the road edge to access the dredges on the Snake moorage.

So, things would be much worse

if not for the actions taken by community members two years ago but there is still need to enforce current use permit codes and minimum driving standards. Dan Scholten Box 1248 Nome Alaska 99762

NSEDC awards six Small Business Initiative grants to budding regional businesses

NSEDC grant funding aims to diversify the local business base in the Norton Sound region

NSEDC Communications Director

Efforts to parlay housing, herding and hot chocolate all into sustainable businesses were awarded shares of $105,000 in total grant funding available through the 2012 Small Business Initiative (SBI). In all, six proposals received funding during an awards ceremony in Nome on Oct. 4, marking the fifth year of the competitive business grant program run by Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation.

Patterned after the Alaska Federation of Natives' Alaska Marketplace Competition, NSEDC accepts SBI proposals each year from emerging or expanding small businesses located in NSEDC member communities. A panel of judges, who are independent of NSEDC, evaluated the proposals and selected a small number of finalists. The finalists were invited to present their businesses in person to the judges during a final evaluation process. Following this interview process, the judges allocated all or part of the $105,000 to the winning proposals. No single proposal may receive more than

In 2012 a total of 21 proposals were received and were narrowed down to a final six. All six finalists this year were awarded funding. The 2012 SBI recipients are a diverse group, covering reindeer herding in Stebbins, unique dome shelters in Nome, taxidermy services in Unalakleet, a coffee shop in Unalakleet, spray-foam insulation services in Nome, and a fabric/yarn supply store in Nome.

SBI grant recipients are not simply handed a check and wished good luck. NSEDC either reimburses the business or directly pays vendors for approved purchases. Grant recipients have two years to implement their business plans and utilize the available funding. The SBI program also provides small business support to the recipients through items such as QuickBooks accounting training. Award winners are Arctic Domes (Nils Hahn), shelter domes sales and assembly, Nome, $20,000; Arctic Wolves Taxidermy and Art (Gary Eckenweiler) Taxidermy and arts, Unalakleet $20,000; Cool Beans TNCO (Carol Charles), Coffee and snack shop, Unalakleet, $14,000; Katcheak Reindeer Herd (Theodore Katcheak), commercial reindeer meat distributor, Stebbins, $11,000; Sawtooth Energy Solutions (Kevin Busk), spray-foam insulation company, Nome, $20,000; The Whimsy Shop (Kim Galleher), Fabric, yarn and gift store, Nome, $20,000.

Arctic Domes

As Nome experiences its latest gold rush, Nils Hahn saw an opportunity with all the fortune-seekers arriving on the town's doorstep without a place to stay. Warmer and more secure than a wall tent or yurt, Hahn plans to market portable shelter domes made of fiberglass or highdensity plastic. The domes can be insulated, feature locking doors and windows, and are bear-proof. Made of several curved panels that are bolted together, the shelters can be erected or dismantled in a day. In addition to the new waves of miners. Hahn notes that the shelters would work well for hunting/fishing camp sites or for work camps.

doing taxidermy for the last four years mainly as a hobby. As more people have come to him seeking his services, Eckenweiler has decided to take his work to the next level through a full-fledged business. Eckenweiler plans to advertise by traditional means as well as by hanging his fish and game mounts in public spaces. He plans on marketing his services to both local and visiting hunters, and hopes to grow the business enough to take on an assistant.

Cool Beans TNCO

Formerly known as the Kuupiaq House, the Cool Beans coffee shop in Unalakleet is set to expand under the ownership of Carol Charles. The shop is known for its smoothies and coffee drinks, and owns the only espresso machine in the community. Charles wants to bring more goods into the mix with the addition of new kitchen equipment, such as an ice cream machine and commercial mixer. She is also planning a new look for the shop with the addition of a bar and stools that allows better utilization of the available space. Cool Beans eventually plans to develop a lunch menu in addition to its drinks and baked good offerings

Katcheak Reindeer Herd,

Introduced in the late 1800s, there is a long history of reindeer herding on the Seward Peninsula.

Ted Katcheak of Stebbins has worked to keep that tradition alive and is looking to develop the economic potential of his herd by marketing and selling reindeer products on a wider basis. The addition of a corral, a walk-in freezer will be the first step to growing the business, allowing for increased meat production and sales. With increasing attention placed on sustainable, organic and healthy foods, reindeer meat is an attractive product for today's market. In addition to supplying the more populated regions of the state, locally produced reindeer meat has great potential for in-region grocery stores in the region comes at a high cost since Norton Sound communities find themselves at the end of a long supply chain.

Sawtooth Energy Solutions

Sawtooth Energy Solutions counts on a few constants in the region that do not appear to be going away anytime soon: cold weather and high fuel prices. Kevin Busk's Nomebased proposal looks to take a bite out of both those elements. Sawtooth Energy Solutions will be a spray-foam insulation service offering an alternative to foam-board or fiberglass insulation products. Busk notes that spray-foam allows for smaller volumes of materials to be shipped to the region since the product greatly expands once applied. An added benefit, he said, is that sprayfoam insulation gives greater rigidity to structures which is a plus in a region known for its strong winds. Spray-foam is also seamless, meaning there are fewer places for warm air to escape or cold air to enter a

The Whimsy Shop Anyone who has attended a local craft fair knows there are some serious and talented people in the Norton Sound region when it comes to sewing. Kim Galleher of Nome quickly learned after opening the Whimsy Shop in 2010 that those creating kuspuks, mukluks and mittens were eager and willing to purchase their materials locally. Galleher initially opened her shop to offer gifts and crafting supplies, and fabric and yarn immediately took center stage when it came to sales. Galleher has worked to keep her prices low and offers her customers something that you cannot get through online shopping-that ability to feel and see her products, ensuring that the quality and color of the fabric or yarn match expectations. With her funding, Galleher looks to expand into a larger retail space and to develop a catalog that displays the products created by regional crafters.

NSEDC thanks all who submitted proposals for the 2012 competition and encourages those who did not make the finals to further develop their applications for 2013. NSEDC also thanks this year's panel of judges who dedicated time to evaluating all the proposals and selecting the grant recipients. Judges for 2012 were Mark Vink and Annabelle Cunningham of Unalakleet; and David Olson, Donna James and Jimmy Adams of Nome. Adams is a former SBI grant recipient who received funding for a driving instruction

HERE TO TELL ABOUT IT—J. Brent Tuttle (right) and Wayne Miller (center) had a story for Cliff McHenry (left) after high water lifted Tuttle's leased tug boat "wannabe" gold dredge onto the rocks Oct. 12 near St. Michael on Norton Sound. Sea water coming into the listing vessel sent Tuttle and Miller scurrying into survival gear and into a life boat.

Gold miners survive sinking tug boat disaster near St. Michael

By Sandra L. Medearis

J. Brent Tuttle got more adventure than he expected when he set off with a navigator to put his tugboat gold dredge wannabe away for the winter in St. Michael.

Tuttle arrived mid-season, tying up at Nome's small boat harbor in July after a month-long harrowing trip from Portland, Ore.

Now he was going to tuck his boat away, go south to tell some tales and prepare for next year.

High seas a few miles from the Norton Sound destination village had other ideas. They lifted Tuttle's 70-foot vessel onto the rocks again and again until water coming into the boat sent Tuttle and Wayne Miller, navigator, to the life raft. Both survived, plucked from the emergency craft by St. Michael people and carried to the village clinic.

As many had in TV Land the past winter, Tuttle became inspired by TV gold mining shows with dreams of golden treasures for himself and his wife.

On the Web:

www.nomenugget.net E-mail:

nugget@nomenugget.com

"I was sitting on the sofa. 'I can do that,' I said to my wife."

Tuttle, living in Golden, Colo., took off west hunting for the boat that would carry him to submerged gold mining adventures offshore Nome, Alaska.

He came across Lee Hendren, owner of a towboat service based in Portland, Ore. that had been operating on the Columbia River for a hundred years.

Hendren shared Tuttle's dream. He made it easy for Tuttle to use the tugboat Captain Hendren. All Tuttle had to do was put in an engine.

Sixty-five thousand dollars and thousands of sea miles later, Tuttle and a partner, now gone home, hove into Port of Nome, ready for riches.

Riches did not materialize but an expensive education attached itself indelibly to Tuttle.

By his own accounts, he had not enough experience and too much of the wrong equipment. He stood on the docks days ago with credit cards maxed and pockets hanging inside out. The missus was a mortgage payment or two short of being real happy with his decision to go off to Alaska to mine gold from underwater beaches.

"Everything I had was over-engineered," he said. And then there was the weather. Another miner, at it for years, befriended Tuttle in his darkest hour. John Mehelich put Tuttle to work as a diver. Tuttle's cut of the gold they got put over $3,000 in his pocket.

"Then came the weather. I had told my wife I would start sending home that kind of money. I did not plan on six weeks of foul weather," Tuttle said.

Nevertheless, Tuttle did not tuck his tail. He planned to return in 2013.

"I'll be back. I know how to mine the gold now. I'll be back," Tuttle vowed, eyes full of the steadfast intent that marks those afflicted with gold fever.

A large crane at the harbor could get his vessel out of the water, getting ready to freeze now and stay that way until spring, but Tuttle had no way to get his vessel onto the uplands storage area, he said. He decided to take the Captain Hendren to St. Michael and stash it there until spring. In preparation, he parted out equipment on the boat—an excavator, a pump, other stuff attractive to miners, to raise some cash.

After delays wiped out the opportunity to follow a local fisherman across Norton Sound, Tuttle decided to take off Oct. 11 with Miller, whom he hired to help him. Needless to say, Tuttle had never taken a vessel to St. Michael. After loosing steering control off Cordova on the way to Nome and being rescued by the U.S. Coast Guard, Tuttle was taking no chances.

The plucky pair set off to St. Michael. They traveled during the night. All went OK until they came up close, about three miles from St. Michael.

The boat stopped against something hard.

"We were against some rocks," Tuttle said, unwinding his yarn Oct.

Juneau man accused of sexual abuse of minor arrested

By Diana Haecker

A succession of unusual circumstances led to the arrest of a 66-year old man from Juneau in Nome last week, who was wanted on a $100,000 arrest warrant by the Alaska State Troopers.

John W. Strickling was wanted for several counts of sexual abuse of a minor in Juneau and Ketchikan over a span of several years starting in 2002 through 2009. A grand jury indicted John W. Strickling on four counts of sexual abuse of a minor in the first degree and one count of sexual abuse of a minor in the second degree. Strickling allegedly sexually abused his step-daughter. According to court papers, the alleged abuse started when she was five years old until she was ten or eleven years old.

According to Lt. David Campbell with the Juneau Police Department, an investigation into Strickling's case began on January 10, 2011 when the victim's mother contacted the police after having learned from her daughter that Strickling, her ex-husband, had sexually abused the child. Campbell said that the investigation was ongoing but that Juneau detectives had a hard time finding Strickling. On August 23, the Juneau district attorney stated in an affidavit that Strickling was believed to be in Nome. Campbell said that Alaska State Troopers were asked to assist, but also couldn't locate Strickling in Nome.

In a twist of fate, Strickling's whereabouts came to light through a reality show on TV. A Juneau detective working on the case happened to watch the Discovery Channel reality show "Bering Sea Gold" and saw Strickling's son being part of the TV program. The son made remarks on camera that he is in Nome with his father. Nome's radio station KNOM last week broadcasted a news story that Strickling was a wanted man and was believed to be in Nome.

Strickling heard the news piece on the radio and, according to Alaska State Trooper Sergeant Charlie Cross, walked into the AST office and surrendered to the authorities. Strickling was taken into custody and transported to Juneau for a court appearance on Monday.

NSHC CEO resigns

By Diana Haecker

After 11 months on the job, Norton Sound Health Corporation CEO and president Deven Parlikar gave his 90-day notice of resignation last week. NSHC board of directors met in an executive session on Monday, accepted the resignation and made it effective as of Monday evening, Oct. 15.

Angie Gorn, most recently vice president for Hospital Services, has been appointed by the board to lead NSHC as the interim CEO and president.

There has been a high turn-over of CEOs hired to fill the top job at NSHC in the past few years.

Parlikar was hired to lead the health corporation in November 2011, taking over from interim CEO and president Roy Agloinga who filled the position for five months after former CEO Carol Piscoya retired in June 2011.

Carol Piscoya served as CEO and president from 2009 until 2011. Prior to Piscoya's leadership at the helm of NSHC, Michael Lake of Florid served only for one year as CEO and president.

NSHC did not issue a formal statement as of press time and board chair Emily Hughes could not be reached for comment.

Letters -

Dear Editor,

It is with deep sadness that I write this letter to the Nome Nugget to inform the community of my departure from Norton Sound Health Corporation as its President/CEO. Although I had afforded the board a 90 day notice period, I was informed by Board Chair Emily Hughes to make my resignation effective immediately on Oct 15 and clear out my personal effects and severe my relationship with Norton Sound Health Corporation. As much as I would have liked the opportunity to say a proper good bye to my staff, I understand the Board's trepidation to have me around the hospital and respect their decision to separate my employment from NSHC. So exactly 11 months to the day and possibly the time of when I signed my contract to come work here, I was relieved of my duties.

These past 11 months have been very exciting and enjoyable for me. Possibly the best experience of my career, bar none, for two primary reasons – first, the talent and expertise of the incredible staff that works at Norton Sound Health Corporation, including our village clinics; and secondly, the wonderful community that embraced me so quickly with so much love. It is unique when one thinks of a place so remote that has somehow attracted so many great people, so much energy and such positive power. I am deeply humbled by NSHC employees, who despite the instability in governance and management have continued to foster the best level of service and servitude to the community. NSHC has been very successful in providing high quality, cost effective care not because of, but in spite of the actions of some in its governance, which speaks volumes for the integrity of its staff and owner beneficiaries.

I have had a great career and have met some wonderful people in my lifetime and I want to take this opportunity to thank the many of you who I consider my friends and confidantes. I hope that the Board of Directors recognizes the potential that needs to be tapped at NSHC that can allow it to be become a world class health system. But for that to happen, Letters to the editor must be signed and include an address and phone number. Thank yous and political

The Politics of Numbers

Math is apolitical. It has no liberal or conservative bias. We listen to the politicians trying to put a spin on math. We also have to tolerate the fools who can't understand the numbers and are taken in by the ideology of politics.

Numbers are reality, but can we trust them? Look at the problems between 6s and 7s. They will never get along— the odd guy always trying to get even. They will never be happy. Can we really trust a 7 to be neutral? We all know that figures lie and liars figure. And that decimal point! Honestly. Someone is always dropping it. Never trust a decimal point. Numbers are real, never mind the imaginary ones. Numbers are reality. We base our lives on reality. Numbers are not political. When the Labor Department crunched the numbers and determined that the unemployment rate is 7.8 percent, the right winged politicians started to flap, fueled by the screaming heads on Fox News. These are the same folks who discredit science because it uses those liberal biased numbers.

What's going to happen in our future when problem solvers can't utilize reality because it has been replaced with talking empty heads who think that facts are optional and reality is subjective? We can't afford such ignorance. The politics of numbers just doesn't add up. — N.L.M.-

ublished daily except for Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday Not published the last week of December they will have to allow the new CEO and his/her team the freedom to foster independent thought, the ability to explore options, the security to make mistakes, and in doing so, make a major paradigm shift from being punitive to being more supportive and respectful of staff. Success is rarely handed to organizations or individuals on a silver platter and it is never a destination; but it is a fabulous journey, one where way stations give us pause to celebrate small victories, where small deviations from the original road map define learning lessons; but in the end, the entire team has to ride it, bear with the bumps on the road, without consequences or retribution and with tremendous pride, a great team spirit and incredible mutual support. I know this team is capable of that because I had the honor to ride along side them for the past 11 months. The journey was hard but the company was great. We shared many laughs, a few good cries, but most importantly we did it as a team with a unified vision. So I can confidently speak to the ability of my former team at NSHC, YES THEY CAN.

Thank you so much, Nomeites, my former co-workers at Norton Sound Health Corporation and friends. I will always look at this time in my life as one that brought me great fulfillment and joy, challenged me every day, made me a better human being and a stronger administrator. For that, I remain in your debt.

To Norton Sound Health Corporation's Board of Directors, I share a quote from Martin Luther King, Jr.

"In the end, we will remember not the words of our enemies, but the silence of our friends". This is your health system, and you carry the burden of your community's healthcare on your shoulders. Speak up when necessary, question status quo and demand only the best for your constituents. Use that power vested in your by your communities wisely, willfully and judiciously. To quote Spiderman (and my dear friend John Bioff), "With great power, comes great responsibility"

A Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

The Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum continues the look back at the 1900 Nome Gold Rush with more perspective from Wilfred A. Mc-Daniel. Here are more excerpts from "Alaska Beckons" written by Wilfred in 1943. His love of Nome is quite evident in that his experiences in this exquisite land are still fresh in his mind four decades later.

With less and less hours of daylight, everything is freezing especially the Brothers McDaniel. Do we stay or go? Spend the winter in a tent at -20F or go home to sunny San Jose, California and return next June. Which would you choose?? ...

Alaska beckons By Wilfred A. McDaniel

"How cold is it?" Ed inquired, as I proceeded to get the breakfast, after a chilly night. I looked at the thermometer hanging outside, over the tent door. "Ten below zero," I replied, "We can't stand this much longer!"

After all of the outfit had been stacked, engine and pump bearings and moving parts sealed in heavy grease and canvassed, the respite from the strenuous labor of the season just finished, was indeed, a welcome relaxation! Many details still occupied our time, however, and there was still an important decision to be made. We must soon make permanent plans for the long winter, just beginning, or if we decide to go "Outside," make reservations for the trip out. This was our final decision, for from experience gained, many changes in the pumping plant could be made, making necessary the selection and purchase of needed parts, which could best be done there.

LOCAL

Steamers were anchored in the roadstead, and a number had already departed with miners returning to "the States." Navigation would soon close and all craft would be compelled to leave in a few days or risk the Arctic pack, which usually drifted in, early in November, effectually closing navigation until the following June.

"Well," said Ed, one morning. "I'll go to Nome and get a couple of steamer tickets, and you had better burn out that amalgam and fix it up, and we'll take it out to 'Frisco, to the mint.

This I did, putting the mixture of gold and quicksilver into the iron retort, heating it in the stove to a red heat, recovering the 'quick' in a pan of water in which the small tube from the retort was placed. This done, weighing and packing it safely came next. The gold was weighed on the scales which we had purchased from the, now, defunct New York Company! The bullion tipped the balance at 125 ounces, not bad for a season of inexperience and handicaps. Expenses for labor and operating the plant, amounting to about fifteen hundred dollars, had required the sale of nearly another hundred ounces, and this had been sold to the banks in Nome.

Ed returned with the tickets. "The Senator sails on the 25th," he said, "We've just two days left to get packed and get down to Nome!"

The Alaska Legislature voted to place the question of issuing bonds for critical transportation infrastructure before the people of Alaska in this upcoming general election on November 6th. If voters say YES to these bonds, the project that will be built in our own community will be the Port of Nome Improvements including design and construction of extending the causeway to meet the demands of increase ocean vessel

The Port of Nome is very important to transportation of goods and services in Western Alaska. All goods being transported into the Port of Nome are placed on smaller vessels and are lightered to villages in Western Alaska as far south up the Yukon River and as far North as villages in the Kotzebue region. There is regional support for the City of Nome's request to the Alaska Legislature to be included in the issuing of bonds for this critical infrastructure

There are a number of points that voters in our community should consider when voting on this issue:

The projects are distributed throughout the state of Alaska with $195.4 million in 18 port projects and $254.5 million for road congestion relief and resource development

These bonds will be paid for by general funds of the state and will not increase your taxes.

These projects will create jobs in our community during construction and also contribute long term to our local economy once they are completed.

According to the Alaska Department of Revenue, due to current low interest rates, the cost of these bonds will be at an all time low.

The Department of Revenue also testified during the legislative session that issuing these bonds will not affect the state's bond rating which is currently at AAA.

Transportation is critical to our economy and our way of life. With the opening of the Arctic for OCS exploration, Alaskans need key infrastructure in place for national security, environmental response, and search and rescue capabilities. The Port of Nome Improvements will play a key role in developing the State of Alaska and the Nation. I will be voting on BONDS YES on this Bonding Proposition A and I hope vou will join me. Please vote on November 6th, 2012. Your vote counts!

Denise Michels, Mayor Nome, Alaska 99762

To the Editor:

I write this letter at the behest of a citizen who expressed concern over the ballot counting of the municipal election of October 2, 2012. First of all, I'd like the citizenry of Nome to know that the ballot machine consists of two separate parts: 1) the machine itself, which contains the document feeder apparatus; and 2) the memory card, which tells the machine which ballots to accept and which ballots to reject. The memory card is also responsible for the actual tabulation of the votes. The issue that caused some concern was the refusal of the machine to accept some properly marked ballots. For approximately an hour, the document feeder was very temperamental. During that time, the machine was periodically rocked to get the wheels of the feeder mechanism to spin. When this was happening, the machine's screen would flash a display, informing the election officials that the machine needed to be re-fed the ballot. The public should know that at no time did the machine accept an improperly voted ballot. Similarly, at no time did the memory card tabulate a vote that it shouldn't have. When the document feeder became entirely incapable of processing ballots, a replacement was ordered from the State Office of Elections. While the memory card was being transferred from the first machine to the second, all ballots were secured in an "emergency ballot box." When the polls closed, each of these ballots was entered into, and counted by, the new machine.

13, back in Nome. He went on the radio to see if there was a mariner or fisherman who could direct them to the channel. A responder told him they would have to go out three miles to avoid reef-like rocks underwater, Tuttle said. Then the waves started to lift the vessel shoreward.

"Yessirree, that's what happened," Wayne Miller said—high waves and low tide.

"The big waves took us up and down. The water was so shallow that when we went down, we would hit the bottom," Miller said Monday. "We'd roller coaster to the side. Then Wayne did his job. I told Brent, 'It's time to leave this vessel.' I got him off there safe."

Tuttle didn't move right away to get into his life gear, he said.

"I was in total denial. I thought, 'Oh, we can make it."

With Miller's urging, Tuttle had a change of heart. He started to scamper into his gear while Miller got the life raft ready.

"One thing I want you to be sure to tell people," Miller said. "It says use scissors to cut the straps on the life raft. There is no time to use scissors. Wayne knows that now."

Miller ripped the raft loose.

"It blew up backwards, upside down," Miller said. "The door was tied open, making it susceptible to water."

Indeed, Tuttle said, Miller had to go into the water to right the life raft. Then Miller's suit started taking on water. Tuttle slid into the raft from the low side of the vessel. He didn't have far to go, he said.

"Wayne was having trouble getting into the raft. He was tired and heavy. I started yelling at him and cussing, telling him this time we were going to get him in. We got one of his legs over, and his arm, and then got him into the raft," Tuttle recounted the day after the ordeal.

"I said 'Help me with my back,'" Miller said.

The pair found that they were still inseparable from the 70-foot tugboat.

There had been two lines not just one, attaching the life raft. One was attached, keeping them tethered to the Captain Hendren.

"We debated about cutting the other line, but we also were looking at the black rocks along the shore that we would have to deal with," he

"I had issued a "May Day," but no one came. After about two hours, we looked toward shore and saw people collecting there. We cut the rope and drifted toward them. I was worried about how we would get ashore being tired and cold," Tuttle said.

"I didn't have to worry about that. People were reaching into the raft and pulling me out, getting me safely onto the beach," Tuttle said.

Miller said he made it by himself. "I waddled up to the shore. I was tired and then some," he said.

The people were ready for them, Tuttle said.

"They grabbed us and started stripping our clothes off down to naked. They were covering us with clothes and furs, all sorts of stuff. We started to get warm."

The village clinic was on alert for the rescue.

"Come, the clinic is waiting for you," people told them. Many hands picked the two survivors up and stuffed them in the bed of a 4X4 ATV "side-by-side" and took them to the clinic.

This part of the rescue, besides all the wonderful people of St. Michael, was one of the best, according to Tuttle. When they reached the clinic, the staff enveloped each man in a Bair Hugger, an inflated device that puts out warm air for treatment of hypothermia.

"Ah, that felt good. So good. Man!" Tuttle grinned, thinking back.

Does Tuttle still plan to return? Yep. Even more so— couldn't stay away, he said.

"After all that happened this summer, it's still the people. I've met so many nice people in Nome and St. Michael. In the village, they took us into their home, fed us, nobody would take any money," Tuttle said.

"I met some guys who are going to take me hunting and fishing," he

His wife is waiting for him in Colorado.

"She said 'we are going to talk about this," Tuttle said.

Official reports say the vessel went aground around 1:30 p.m. on Oct. 12 about two miles west of St

Michael.

Six-foot seas and a 30-knot north wind pushed the vessel further onto the rocks, where it lost propulsion and steering.

It remained hard aground, listing at 45° to 50°.

The vessel has 600 gallons of fuel aboard along with operational quantities of lubricants. No petroleum spill was observed over the weekend.

On Monday, weather prevented removing fuel or salvage of the vessel. The U.S. Coast Guard has requested a salvage plan from the owner before beginning fuel removal. USCG and DEC are monitoring the fuel and the vessel, according to USCG Petty Officer First Class David Mosely.

The company that leased him the Captain Hendren had it insured, according to Tuttle.

Saturday, Harbormaster Joy Baker told Tuttle to forget the boat. "That's just material There are

"That's just material. There are other boats all over. You are here. That's what's important," she said.

SALVAGEABLE?—The 70-foot tugboat Captain Hendren remains where it ran hard aground Oct. 12. None of the 600 gallons of fuel aboard has escaped, according to a State Dept. of Environmental Conservation release Monday. The U.S. Coast Guard continues to monitor the vessel and coordinate a lightering plan with Lee Hendren, vessel owner. Inclement sea conditions, including freezing spray, were preventing salvage crews from removing the fuel and lube oils Monday.

REPEAT AFTER ME—Nikolai Alexander Ivanoff takes the oath of office Oct. 9 when he pulled a chair to the worktable at Nome Planning Commission. Ivanoff, long-term employee of Alaska Gold Co., was the sole applicant for the seat. He has recently become a citizen of the United States.

Ivanoff sworn in to planning panel

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Planning Commission has a plan on the table to clear passages through town and encourage residents to comply with City regulations to bring order to the community and along the way, revenue into the coffers.

They will get out the crayons and draw blocks—not city blocks—but manageable segments of neighborhoods to target for concentration concerning misuse of zone and building codes, clear beloved jalopies with long-expired license plates sitting in the public right-of-way and other issues pertaining to safety and welfare of citizens.

The planning panel would be working on a way to split up the town fairly, to number them and to choose blocks at random for cleanup, progressing one by one. They want to make the sections not too small, not to big, but just right, to start abating violations.

"We don't want to make them so small that we don't get around to all of them," Commissioner Charlie Weiss said.

New on the planning board, Nikolai Alexander Ivanoff will help with this process. Ivanoff applied for an open seat in July and received his appointment by Mayor Denise Michels this month.

He is happy to be serving the community, Ivanoff said after he took the oath with Deputy City Clerk Bill Gartung. Ivanoff has often attended Museum and Library Commission interests in the past and ran without success for a Council seat in the October election.

"Now my application has been reviewed and I am on the planning commission. I am willing to learn from you," Ivanoff said. "Now I am a cheechako (newcomer) on the commission or I am sitting down on the fire seat [hot seat]," Ivanoff, who recently earned his U.S. citizenship, laughed.

The commission, with help of their professional planner, Eileen Bechtol of Bechtol Associates, has penciled in a work plan: develop a packet of information; research legal or administration issues; publicize the abatement lottery; split the community into areas using a map; number the areas; conduct a lottery; abate the violations.

In other business Oct. 9, the commission continued discussion on investigating the pros and cons of annexation.

Professional planner Eileen Bechtol of Homer-based Bechtol Planning and Development has been helping the commission grapple with getting information and judging the implications in benefits and costs of redrawing City boundaries to include areas served by Nome Joint Utility System.

Figuring the advantages and disadvantages calls for a look from the perspective of folks on both sides of the current boundaries. Currently: if Nome Police Dept. goes outside the city limits, there is no reimbursement, with costs coming out of the annual budget. NPD goes outside the city on a limited basis, as when they need to assist the Alaska State Troopers, according to NPD Chief John Papasodora.

Nome Airport runway fixed and reopened

By Diana Haecker

LOCAL

On Thursday, Oct. 11, the main runway of the Nome International Airport reopened as the emergency repairs to the dip at the west end were nearly completed. Dept. of Transportation and Public Facilities spokesperson Hannah Blankenship said that only minor work still needs to be completed and this could be done in between flights or at night.

"We need to finish the grooving – putting little groves in the pavement so that the airplane has better traction- and finish the painting and striping," Blankenship said.

Unstable soils caused a reoccurring dip in the runway, necessitating repairs to the same section of the so-called 10-28 runway every five years

DOT&PF contracted Twin Peaks Construction to make the repairs and they tried something new: for the first time repairs included dynamic compaction of the soil. The emergency repair began on August 13. Twin Peaks Construction installed a culvert, storm drains and performed necessary survey work, but work stalled when the arrival of the dynamic compaction crane, enroute on a barge headed for Nome, was postponed due to bad weather and rough seas. This left only the cross-wind runway open for flight traffic.

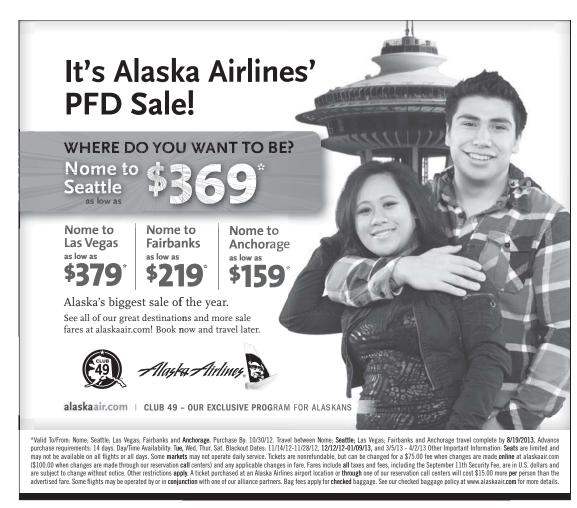

A combination of rainy, foggy weather and a short runway only approachable from the South resulted in many delayed jet flights.

While waiting for the crane, the main runway re-opened on August 25 to regular flight traffic and was closed again on Sept. 17 as the crane's arrival was near and contractors could start prepping the section by cutting up the asphalt and exposing the material.

When the crane arrived, yet another obstacle needed to be overcome. The crane was too heavy to be trucked across the existing Snake River Bridge. After receiving a necessary ADF&G permit, the crane was put on a truck, moved down Port Road and along the dirt road toward Dredge 6 and then driven across Snake River and onto the airport runway. Once in place, the crane went to work. During the runway closure from Sept 17 until last week, weather for the most part stayed clear and cold, which allowed jet traffic to proceed almost as normal using the North-South crosswind runway. According to Alaska Airlines spokeswoman Marianne Lindsey, the last phase of the runway project went like clockwork, with only a few delays and no cancellations of Alaska Airlines flights. "The weather cooperated so we saw very little impact and are pleased that the DOT was able to get this important work done," Lindsey said.

Student Board Member

Rebecca Sherman-Luce, Nome Beltz High School student board member, reported that the atmosphere out at Beltz is positive and noted she was pleased with a presence of administration in the classrooms throughout the first quarter of school.

Superintendent Report

Enrollment as of October 8, including all but the intensive students in Nome Elementary, Nome Beltz Jr./Sr. High, Anvil City Science Academy (ACSA), Nome Youth Facility and Extensions added up to 691 students. Another count will be taken on October 26 for the final enrollment number to be determined. The budget was built on a count of 680 so this is good news for the district.

Nome will be hosting an Arts Institute in the summer of 2013. Bering Strait School District will contribute $40,000 and Northwest Arctic Borough

School District will add $20,000 as Nome partners with them to contribute teaching space, dorm space and transportation for the two-week event.

Nome Eskimo Community has received a $419,000 Alaska Native Education Grant to partner with NPS in funding a Family Advocacy position. Details will need to be worked out according to Brawner, but will be "patterned after what's been happening at Cook Inlet Tribal Council."

Nome Elementary School

Principal Bob Grimes handed out orange ribbons to the board and audience, which read, "Unite Against Bullying! Make it Orange! Make it End!" NES participated in a nationally organized Unity Day on October 10 in an effort to show support and awareness for the anti-bullying month of October by wearing something orange.

"Reading Mastery is just clicking right along," according to Grimes. Students who used to not read are picking up books and reading. A class of first graders taught by Jeff Collins has already achieved reading goals set to be accomplished by November and higher goals have now been set.

Grimes also mentioned a reading class Keith Conger teaches of 30 students that has "a lot of cooperative learning going on." Board Member Nickels expressed concern over a class that large. It was explained that there are 88 5th and 6th graders taught by five core teachers, or an average class size of 18 students. However, teachers collaborate and determine groups of varying sizes to teach certain curriculum. In this case, Conger teaches a group of 30 stronger readers, which allows a smaller group of eight students with intensive reading needs the best learning environment.

Board President Betsy Brennan asked about a recent letter to The Nome Nugget regarding an incident between a bus driver and an NPS employee. Superintendent Mike Brawner assured the board that the matter was being addressed through the guidance of legal counsel.

Nome-Beltz Jr./Sr. High School

A Driver's Education class just kicked off involving 25 students, juniors and seniors, with Terry Roelfsema as the instructor, according to Principal Scott Handley. Beltz is "on the edge" of offering robotics, culinary arts, sewing, martial arts, archery in PE and an intramural program in the spring. Funding for the programs is provided by the Youth Activity Grant. Handley continues to survey the students' interests with the hope of offering classes and programs that will encourage more kids to want to be in school.

Handley plugged the activities program noting that students must maintain a 2.5 grade point average to participate. There were 38 students involved in Cross-Country running, 58 in Volleyball (28 high school; 30 junior high), 14 in Cultural Dance, 15 in Ballroom Dance and approximately 25 in Wrestling. He believes these programs make a big difference in promoting academic achievement and positive social behavior.

Nome-Beltz also channels students receiving a failing grade in a class to after school tutoring from 3:10 p.m. to 4:00 p.m. where a teacher is available to help.

APEX, online "recapture" classes, is showing a 70 percent success rate at this point. Handley is not pleased with that, he said, and is striving for 100 percent, although he acknowledges that 70 percent is a "good achievement."

Charter School

ACSA is currently at full enrollment with 45 students and has a waiting list of 25 students according to Principal and teacher Todd Hindman. Board members were asked to consider participating on a committee to explore the idea of expanding the enrollment of students in future years.

According to a written report submitted by Hindman, "ACSA was able to meet NCLB's Adequate Yearly Progress, for the 2011-2012 school year." 100 percent of the students scored advanced or proficient in reading, and 98 percent scored advanced or proficient in math and writing.

NBHS gym lighting bid

The school board approved a bid from Norman Lamps, Inc. in the amount of $30,500, with an additional $3,000 in shipping, to replace the lights at the NBHS gym. Although the gym is fairly new, it seems the replacement bulbs are difficult to find. Brawner also reported that the new lights would "use less than half of the electricity currently being used." The lights will be funded with the leftover funds from the elementary gym floor replacement project.

NPS Annual Survey

Parents, staff and community members of Nome are encouraged to take the survey at www.nomeschools.com (click on the big red arrow). Input will help shape the direction of the school district.

Next meeting

The Nome Board of Education will next meet in a work session on October 23 at 5:30 p.m. at the NES library. Topics include: ACSA State application, Special Education Monitoring Report, DIBELS and MAP results, Technology training plan and board members' interest in serving on various committees.

As regards the Nome Volunteer Ambulance Dept., the City has no memorandum of understanding with the state to pay for calls outside of town or to indemnify the City on liability.

The demand for response services and the cost of providing them outside City limits has to be studied, commissioners said. The conversation centered on research needing to be taken up at this point, not a decision on whether to annex outlying Customers of NJUS do not pay a different rate for power extended beyond city limits.

That isn't the way it used to be before the City annexed Icyview, Chuck Wheeler, Icyview resident, told the commission.

In other business, the Commission discussed a suggested schedule of fees for demolition of existing structures and fixing excavation of city streets or city right-of-way. Proposed are these fees per hour for demolition: tracked hoe, $165; end dump, $95; 966 loader, $145; D-7 dozer, $145.

For right-of-way repair, if gravel road is not compacted and brought back to original condition, the applicant and person responsible will be charged a fee of $9 per square foot. If asphalt road is excavated or disturbed and not repaired to original condition, the City will repair at a cost of $11 per square foot.

Commissioner Charlie Weiss said he wanted to see a deposit required, refundable to a contractor if the fix is satisfactory. If not, the price of fixing by the City would be subtracted from the deposit.

"There should be a significant policy involved if there is to be a fee structure," Weiss said.

Commissioner Jimmy Adams questioned whether NJUS would be held to pay fees on repairs following utility work.

"That is supposed to be in their budget," Commissioner Randy Romenesko, former city manager, said.

In yet other business, the commission discussed a draft table of contents for an economic development plan to be fleshed out in the fu-

Finally, the commission was told that the Wien Building would be history on Oct. 11 after the Nome's public works department took it down. The date was tentative, according to employee Allen Maxwell. Monday the Wien Building still stood tall and not so straight on Front Street.

NPFMC drops research plan for NBS Research Area

Northern Bering Sea area remains closed to commercial bottom-trawl fishing

By Laurie McNicholas

Northern Bering Sea communities will welcome a decision by the North Pacific Fishery Management Council on Oct. 9 to forego further development of a research plan for the Northern Bering Sea Research Area and to maintain the boundary of the area. The decision means the nearly pristine area will remain closed to bottom-trawling in the foreseeable future. The Northern Bering Sea has no history of commercial bottom trawling.

The Council established the NBSRA in 2008 because climate change is expected to cause an ecosystem shift that may extend the distribution of crab and fish populations northward into subarctic regions. The NBRSA boundary ranges from approximately the St. Matthew Island area to a point above Little Diomede Island. The council also created four new Habitat Conservation Areas in the Northern Bering Sea, including the St. Lawrence Island HCA. Bottom trawling is prohibited within HCAs to protect bottom habitat from adverse effects of fishing.

The National Marine Fisheries Service (NMFS) Alaska Fisheries Science Center (AFSC) was charged with developing a research plan to investigate impacts of bottom trawling in the NBSRA. Northern Bering Sea tribal groups have strongly opposed opening the NBSRA to bottom trawling in community meetings with AFSC scientists, in tribal consultation with NMFS representatives, in letters to the council and in oral testimony at council meetings in recent years. They voiced deep concern that opening the NBSRA to commercial bottom trawling will impact the subsistence species that sustain their lives, including crab, fish, marine mammals and waterfowl.

The Bering Sea Elders Advisory Group and Kawerak, Inc. have led opposition to opening the NBSRA to bottom trawling. The BSEAG was established in 2007. Its membership currently includes 14 tribes in the Bethel region and 14 tribes in the Nome region. Kawerak is a Nomebased tribal consortium representing 20 tribes.

In 2011, the BSEAG published "The Northern Bering Sea: Our Way of Life", a map report produced in three years with assistance from the Alaska Marine Conservation Council.

It shows extensive culturally and ecologically sensitive areas across the region. The maps were created through interviews with elders and active hunters in 17 villages combined with existing data. The report establishes the vital importance of Northern Bering Sea resources to Alaska Native residents of the region.

Representatives of many Northern Bering Sea tribes and communities attended an NPFMC meeting in June 2011 in Nome. During the meeting the Council reviewed a draft research plan for the NBRSA, as did the Council's Science and Statistical Committee. The SSC identified problems in the research plan, described them in meeting minutes and presented the minutes with an oral report to the Council.

"The stated goal of the research plan is to investigate the effects of bottom trawling on bottom habitats and provide information to the Council in protecting crabs, marine mammals, endangered species, and subsistence needs," reads an excerpt from the SSC minutes. "However, the plan only focuses on the first part of this goal (bottom trawling effects) and fails to provide information on crabs, marine mammals, endangered species and subsistence. Rather than being a comprehensive research plan to address the stated goal, the document is a narrowly focused trawl impact experiment. In addition, the description of the trawling effects study lacks sufficient scientific and technical detail to be evaluated...." (SSC minutes, June 2011, p. 9.)

The SSC questioned the merit of a research plan focused primarily on a before-after-controlled-impact study in the Northern Bering Sea. "The SSC has fundamental questions about the ability to draw correct conclusions about the effects of a prospective trawl fishery from a small-scale, one-time research experiment," the committee stated in its June 2011 minutes (p. 11).

The SSC also asked why the draft plan did not incorporate information about the NBRSA that was collected during community and science workshops, except for brief minutes of the science workshop in an appendix. "Residents of coastal communities have critical knowledge to be incorporated into the research plan," the SCC minutes note. "The SSC received a draft report, titled 'The Northern Bering Sea: Our Way of Life', prepared by the Bering Sea Elders Advisory Group. Though still in draft, this document contains extremely useful information including detailed maps of important areas for walrus, seals, whales, subsistence uses, etc." (SSC minutes June 2011, p. 10.)

Julie Raymond Yakoubian, social science program director for Kawerak, stressed the need for tribal consultation in development of a NBRSA research plan in public testimony at the June 2011 Council meeting. "I want to emphasize that consultation with [tribes] is required by Executive Order 13175 on any actions that have the potential to impact tribes or tribal resources-this includes research and planning activities," Yakoubian stated. "This has not been completed and it appears that NMFS believes that they are not reguired to consult on such activities. Again-consultation is required. The fact that it has not been completed, and the fact that tribes have expressed so much and such intense concern on this issue should also be of great concern to the Council as the body that has directed this plan and research to be carried out.'

Based on the responses from community workshops and SSC comments on the draft plan, the NPFMC set aside development of an NBSRA research plan at the June 2011 meeting. The Council asked the Alaska Fisheries Science Center to produce a discussion paper summarizing information on the Northern Bering Sea ecosystem, potential impacts from bottom trawl fisheries, results of community workshops, descriptions of areas likely to attract commercial interests and the feasibility of conducting more research on the effects of trawling.

The AFSC issued the requested discussion paper, "Considerations for Research Planning in the Northern Bering Sea Research Area," in September for review by the Council at a meeting Oct. 3-9 in Anchorage. The paper cites recent research results indicating that few crab and fish species are present in the Northern Bering Sea in sufficient abundance and distribution to interest the commercial fishing industry. The research included a small-scale bottomtrawl survey conducted in the NBSRA in August 2010 by the National Marine Fisheries Service. Tribal representatives and others from Northern Bering Sea communities opposed the project at a workshop with AFSC scientists in February 2010 due to concerns it would impact subsistence species.

The SSC reviewed the discussion paper at a meeting Oct. 1-2 in Anchorage and advised the Council the document will require a lot of revision whether it is used to inform the public or to become part of a research plan.

The SSC agreed with the paper's authors that a substantial commitment in time and resources will be required to discern bottom trawl impacts on the Northern Bering Sea ecosystem.

"The paper notes that communities bordering the NBRSA are 'dominated by subsistence activities and seasonal employment opportunities' and rightly concludes that this issue is of particular importance to members of those communities," the SSC added. "However, a more explicit section summarizing (and providing references for) what is known about subsistence uses of key species by the communities is needed. The SSC reiterates that it is important to involve local communities into the process early in development of NBS plans and that the research focus should be on the benthic environment, which is most likely to be impacted by bottom-trawl fisheries. Should the Council move forward with development of a NBSRA Research Plan, it should improve this discussion paper with respect to protected resources and potential impacted ecosystem components. More importantly, it will need to include local community input and commit to a long term program." (SSC minutes October 2012, p. 22.)

During public testimony, Yakoubian said Kawerak strongly recommends that the Council keep the NBSRA closed to bottom trawling and terminate further development of a research plan at this time.

'The thing that I wanted to clarifyjust to make sure that everybody was on the same page- was that Bering Strait region tribes are not opposed to all research activities, now or at any time in the future," she added. "As you know, they were opposed to research activities that took place in 2010. That was a specific opposition to those particular activities, and following from that, while our main recommendation is that the research area remain closed to trawling and further development of research activities, we would like to emphasize that any future planning does require consultation with the NMFS and tribes and that tribes are very interested in being consulted on those issues and pursuing relationships with the agency in terms of research.

The NPFMC agreed to a recommendation by the Council's Advisory Panel to forego any further development of a research plan for the NBSRA and maintain the current bottom-trawl boundary.

Council member John Henderschedt commented: "I would just like to say that from a pragmatic standpoint, when we have stretched budgets and a recommendation from the SSC that a great deal of work would be needed to turn this into a useful decision document, and then an acknowledged lack of interest on the part of industry and opposition from other parties fishing in this area, there seems to be little reason to move forward."

Nanook swimmers splash it up at Palmer swim meet

By Kirsten Bey Swim Coach

Fifteen high school teams showed up to the Valley Invitational Swim & Dive Meet at Palmer High School October 11 – 13. Teams came from as far as Nome, Kodiak, Homer, Cordova and Valdez. The Nome-Beltz Nanooks swim team representing Nome at the meet consisted of Klay Baker, Lacy Erickson, Miranda Murphy, Jake Stettenbenz, Zach Sullivan and Torie Thomas. Because the Nanooks did not have at least four swimmers of one gender they were not able to field any relay teams. Each swimmer was allowed to swim only two individual events. Most of the teams at this meet are in Region 4 and this is the big show down for them to see how they stack up against each other just prior to regionals. The Nanooks are able to hold their own in their events.

Close to 900 bodies dove into the water during the preliminary rounds on Friday. The Nome swimmers had 12 of those entries. All of the boys made it to finals in their events. In the preliminary events, Jake Stettenbenz finished ninth out of 43 swimmers in the 50-yard freestyle . He also placed ninth out of 38 swimmers in the 100-yard freestyle, setting personal bests in both events. Nathan Blandford – take note, Jake is knocking on your door.

Klay Baker finished ninth out of 20 swimmers in the 100-yard butterfly with a personal best time, improving by three seconds over his time last year. Klay finished fifth out of 31 swimmers in the 100-yard backstroke, a new event for Klay in competition. Zach Sullivan finished 12th in the 100-yard backstroke and 9th out of 35 swimmers in the 100-yard breaststroke. Zach improved his breaststroke time by 3.5 seconds, also setting a personal best time.

Lacy Erickson swam the 50-yard freestyle finishing 21st out of 41 swimmers and Miranda Murphy finished 27th in the same event. Miranda improved her time by five seconds from two years ago. Miranda also swam the 100-yard freestyle, finishing 18th out of 36 swimmers. Torie Thomas, at her first high school meet, swam the 100-yard backstroke and finished 21st out of 36 swimmers and Lacy Erickson finished 23rd in that event. Torie also swam the 100-yard breaststroke and finished 19th out of 33 swimmers.

At finals on Saturday, Klay Baker earned the team three points by improving his performance in the 100-yard backstroke, finishing fourth overall and missing third place by only two-tenths of a second. Swimmers finishing in seventh to 12th place are in the finals, but do not earn points for their teams.

Jake moved up to seventh place in the finals from ninth in the prelims in the 50-yard freestyle, bettering his time by four-tenths of a second. In the 100-yard freestyle Jake also finished seventh, up from ninth place and improving his time by 1.8 seconds.

In finals, Zach moved up to 10th place in the 100-yard backstroke, bettering his time by 3.5 seconds. The 100-yard breaststroke was held right after the 100-yard backstroke, so Zack had only a few minutes of rest between these two events. He was able to maintain his time from the prelim, but a couple other swimmers were a tad faster in the final. At Regionals, Zach will focus on the breaststroke and swim an event other than backstroke so he has some rest time between events.

The Nanooks Regional Swim Meet is in Fairbanks, October 26 and 27. Barring false starts and disqualifications, all of the swimmers are likely to make it to the finals of their events. Looking at the times from last year's regionals, many of the Nanook swimmers have a good possibility of swimming in the points final division; stay tuned.

There were more family members and supporters than swimmers at the meet, which was no mean feat since the team competed in Palmer. The team thanks Janeen Sullivan, Dave Stettenbenz, Joy Hewitt, Audra Murdock, Skyler O'Connor, Liz and Louis Murphy and Teresa Tiesler, Katie Tompter, Kris Erickson, Gabe Cabrera, Josh Brock, Wolfgang and Heidi Winter, and Karen, Connor and Tucker Looney for cheering them on.

The swim team also gives a big thanks to Dan Sullivan for being on chaperone duty and thanks the Sitnasuak Native Corporation for their support.

 $\ensuremath{\mathsf{GREAT\ JOB-}}$ Torie Thomas, at her first high school meet, swam the 100-yard backstroke.

Lady Nanooks sweep Barrow on senior weekend

By Stephen Palmatier

Coming off wins against West Anchorage, Homer and conference rival Bethel, all on the road, the Nome Lady Nanooks volleyball squad had all the confidence in the world heading into their final games of the regular season against their fiercest conference rival, the Barrow Lady Whalers. Last weekend, they showed the home crowd why they have been at the top of their game, as they took down Barrow in both matches in two tough four set victories.

In the first match last Friday night, the Den of the Mighty Nanooks was rocking as the ladies got their largest crowd of the season. From the opening serve to the final point, the crowd was loud and impacted the way both teams played. In the opening set, Nome got off to a great start, leading 8-1 early, but eventually lost the momentum and dropped the first set to Barrow, 19-25. After the first lost set, the Nome ladies seemed to settle down in the second set as the set went back and forth most of the way, with the Nanooks eventually winning it, 25-23. However, it did not come without some controversy. With the Nanooks down 17-22 in the set, a timeout was called by the Nanooks. During the timeout, the scorekeeper realized a substitution error by Barrow, causing the Lady Whalers to drop three points from their score with Barrow still having the serve in hand. With the change, Nome was down only two points, eventually going on to win the set. It was a large call. Without it the Lady Nanooks may have been down two sets, having to dig out from a big hole.

Nevertheless, Nome took the set and never looked back. Nome took the third set, 25-22 in another back and forth set and finally the fourth set, 25-19, outlasting Barrow in the end.

"I think our team found greatness in this match," said Ariana Horner, junior on the Lady Nanooks squad. "It's a lot of relief with Barrow being a mental hurdle for us in the past years," said Horner.

Horner's comments seemed to be what most of the team thought, knowing Barrow has had the Lady Nanook's number in the past. Lucas Frost, head coach of the Lady Nanooks, echoed those remarks.

"It's the biggest win of our season," said Frost, which were strong words considering the tough competition his ladies had beaten around the state already this year.

With all of the emotions after the win Friday night, the Nome ladies still had another game against the Lady Whalers the following night. Once again, however the ladies did not disappoint as they beat Barrow again in four sets, 22-25, 25-23, 25-21, and 25-18. It was nearly a mirror image of the previous night. Not only did the ladies drop the first set and bounce back with three straight again, but also the scores of each set were nearly the same. Once again, each set was very competitive, going back and forth all night with points. But in the fourth and final set, a key point stood out. In what was a 7-7 tie. a long point, one of many in the matches, took place. Barrow's best striker of the ball, Hilary Lowery, was ready to hit a kill, looking to be a point for Barrow. All of a sudden. senior Taylor Pomeranz for the Nome ladies hit a wonderful block back, giving Nome the point when the ball hit the ground. It was only one point, but the magnitude of the point made the momentum shift in favor of Nome. The Nanooks went on a 6-0 run after the block, eventually leading to the set and match victory.

"That point was a huge momentum shifter," said Frost.

The intense matches added emotions to what already was an emotional weekend. It was senior weekend, the final home game for the six seniors. The seniors honored were Kenna-Sue Contreras, Pamela Tocktoo, and the four varsity starters: Rebecca Luce, Dylan Johnson, Devynn Johnson, and captain Taylor Pomeranz. Being recognized alongside their parents, realizing what their parents have meant to them both on and off the court was emotional for many of the girls.

"My parents have been a big help with everything," said Pomeranz. Senior Devynn Johnson reiterated the same thing.

"It's pretty overwhelming when I reflect on everything that my parents have helped me with over the years," said Johnson.

Even with Frost being only in his first year as Nome's head coach, he understands what each of his seniors has meant to him.

"All of them have been willing to learn new things this year," said Frost. "With Taylor, she's willing to go out of her way to always help the program. With Devynn, she gives a light edge to the team, especially keeping people loose during practices. Becca is my sixth lady and is so consistent and reads plays better than anyone. And Dylan is our great setter that makes our team go," said Frost. "I'm pretty much spoiled with how great these girls are."

With three weeks off until the regional tournament, the key for the Lady Nanooks will be to keep their strong focus all the way through. Coming off wins against Barrow, as big as they are, now gives conference opponents a target to shoot for with Nome now being the top seed in the conference tournament.

"With Barrow, Bethel and Nome all being strong, it could be anyone coming out of Regionals in three weeks," said Seeseei Pili, head coach of the Barrow Lady Whalers, coach there for 17 years.

Pili's assessment is exactly why the focus for Nome will be so crucial over the next few weeks to keep their strong play up that they have displayed the past month. The upcoming regional tournament will be on November 2nd and 3rd in Barrow. Nome will have to beat Barrow again, this time in their home court. But as Nome has shown with wins against Homer and Bethel this year, they can come up huge against hostile crowds.

"Three weeks is a long time, but we need to be able to focus and lock it down for those three weeks and know this is everything for our season coming up," said Devynn Johnson.

Secondly, I'd like the voting public to know that the memory cards used for our elections are very sophisticated devices. For example, they simply do not allow the voting machine to accept blank ballots and ballots with multiple votes for a single race. When such a ballot is cast, the machine ejects it and displays an error message. That error message tells the election officials why the ballot was rejected. The ballot is then taken by the election official, destroyed, logged on a spoiled ballot register, and a new ballot is issued to the voter. I believe it is important, for both open government and public perception, that the voting public knows this information: at no time will the voting machine accept an improperly cast ballot.

Finally, due to the aforementioned malfunction with the City of Nome's voting machine, ballots for the November 6, 2012 City Council Runoff Election will be cast in an old-fashioned ballot box. Thereafter, when the State Office of Elections has finished computing the votes on the presidential ballots, we will insert our memory card into that same machine and tabulate the municipal votes. We firmly believe that this will also eliminate confusion about two entirely separate elections happening simultaneously.

In closing, voting is a right that we, as Americans, should take very seriously. It's a right that is denied to many people around the globe. Therefore, I ask that you exercise that right on November 6, 2012 by coming to Old Saint Joseph's between the hours of 7:00 AM and 8:00 PM to let your voice be heard.

Most Sincerely, City Clerk Tom Moran P.O. Box 281 Nome, AK 99762 907.443.6611

Dear Nancy,

I present this information not as an employee of Norton Sound Regional Hospital, but as a concerned consumer. The following is not endorsed by, or reflects any official policy of the hospital.

It is nearing flu season and I wish to present some important information about the flu.

Who needs the flu shot? According to the CDC, everyone who is at least six months old needs vaccination for the flu.

Influenza (the flu) can be a serious disease that can lead to hospitalization and sometimes even death.

Anyone can get sick from the flu, even if you have never been sick before.

Depending on the year, between 15,000 and 50,000 people die every year from the flu— mostly babies and elders. Those that in native cultures are to be protected.

It is even more important for those who are at high risk of developing serious complications like pneumonia if they get sick with the flu.

People, who have certain medical conditions including asthma, diabetes, and chronic lung disease, are more prone to infection need the flu shot.

Pregnant women and those with babies need the shot.

Persons over 65 years have reduced immunity and need protection.

Cigarette smokers have an increased risk for pulmonary infection and need the flu shot.

Persons who live with or care for Persons who live with or care for any of the above groups should take the flu shot to protect those they care for.

If you get the flu, you can spread

If you get the flu, you can spread it to others even if you don't feel sick. For most healthy people, influenza is an upper respiratory tract infection that lasts several days and requires symptomatic treatment only. Within days, the person's body will eliminate the virus. Many of those who acquire a flu think it is just a 'bad cold' and don't seek care, continue to work and so spread the virus.

Most healthy adults are able to infect others beginning one day before symptoms develop and up to 5 to 7 days after becoming sick. Children may pass the virus for even longer. That is why one kid will get sick, then another and it goes around the entire family.

Symptoms start 1 to 4 days after the virus enters the body. That means that you may be able to pass on the flu to someone else for up to four days before you know you are sick, as well as while you are sick.

Some persons can be infected with the flu virus but have no symptoms. It is possible for a person to be a 'carrier', never feel sick and spread it to others. The others then can become seriously ill or die.

Influenza viruses are spread mainly by droplets made when people with flu cough, sneeze or talk. These droplets can land in the mouths or noses of people who are up to about 6 feet away or possibly be inhaled into the lungs. Less often, a person might get flu by touching a surface or object that has flu virus on it and then touching their own mouth or nose.

The CDC, the Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices (ACIP), and the Healthcare Infection Control Practices Advisory Committee (HICPAC) recommend that all U.S. health care workers get vaccinated annually against influenza.

I want to stress this part. Don't assume that your health care worker has had the flu shot. It is your right as a consumer to ask if they have taken the professional and ethical responsibility to have the shot. If they haven't had the shot, you have every right to ask for another person to care for your needs— or that they wear a mask when near you.

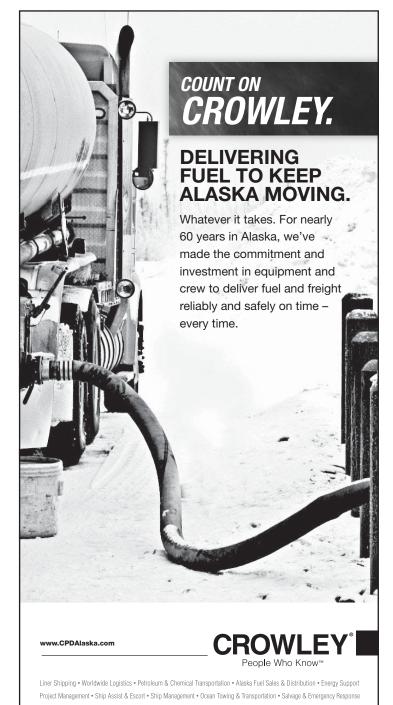

Take care of yourself. Take control of your healthcare. Demand that your healthcare worker has washed their hands and taken the flu shot.

Saying it Sincerely

By Father Ross Tozzi St. Joe's Catholic Church Member Nome Ministerial Association

Kateri Tekakwitha, the Lilly of the Mohawks, will be recognized as the first official Native American Saint at a special Canonization ceremony in Rome on October 21. Just as all of the national sports all have inductions into their respective halls of fame, so too with the Catholic Church. Since the early centuries of the church, those who have lived an exemplary Christian life are recognized by the Church and the faithful for their model lives. Interestingly, Kateri is just one of seven individuals who will be recognized on the 21st.

Jacques Berthieu was a Jesuit priest who served in Madagascar in the late 19th century in the midst of a colonial invasion by the French. He could have chosen the easy path and accepted protection from the invading forces from his home nation. He could have chosen the easy path and used his horse to escape. Instead, he offered the horse to an injured mission worker and stayed with the tribe he ministered to. On June 8, 1896, he chose martyrdom rather than renounce his faith.

Pedro Calungsod was a lay catechist from the Philippines. Pedro willingly accepted the challenge put to him by Father Diego de San Vitores to join him on a mission to foreign islands. In a spirit of faith, Pedro undertook the demanding work asked of him and bravely faced the many obstacles and difficulties he met. In the face of imminent danger, Pedro could have fled for his own safety. Instead, he chose to stand at the side of Father Diego and both were martyred on April 2, 1672 at the age of 17.

Father Giovanni Battista Piamarta was an Italian priest who was especially sensitive to the problems of young people and those of the working class. In the face of a rapidly changing world he worked to give boys, especially the destitute, professional training with which to face the new industrial society. To alleviate the extreme poverty of peasants, he helped to teach new farming techniques which help those who lived on the land to be more fruitful in their framing. Fr Piamarta always gave priority to the spiritual and material well-being of others. He died in 1913 at the age of 72.

Carmen Salles y Barangueras grew up in Spain. At the age of 10 when she received her First Communion, consecrated her life to Jesus through Mary. Carmen later entered a religious order of sisters dedicated to helping women who were living on the margins after a life of crime or prostitution. Sister Carmen became a well-known pioneer in proclaiming equality between men and women. She was a fierce defender of the dignity of women in the home and in society at large. Carmen died in Madrid at the age of 63, in 1911.

Anna Schaffer was born in the heart of Bavaria in 1882. After making her First Communion, she too offered herself to the Lord. She wanted to be a missionary sister, but could not because of a succession of physical accidents and diseases. She accepted these crosses as a way of participating in the passion of Christ. As she accepted suffering with evergreater humility, she came to bear the wounds of Christ. Anna prayed for others constantly and offered consolation to all who turned to her. On 5 October 1925 she received her last Communion. As she was making the Sign of the Cross and saying "Jesus, I live in you." With her loving acceptance of the painful crosses in her life, she bore great witness to the Christian faith.

As superior of the Sisters of St Francis, Mother Marianne Cope responded to a plea for help from the Hawaiian Islands. She led a group of sisters from New York to the Hawaiian Islands to establish hospitals and a system of nursing care for leprosy patients. She convinced the government there was a vital need to save the homeless female children of patients with leprosy and the Kapiolani Home was opened. These well children were able to live in a home on the premises of the hospital for their sick parents. No one other than the sisters could be found to care for those so closely related to people with the dreaded disease of leprosy. She died at the age of 80 in 1918.

Kateri Tekakwitha was an Indian woman born in 1656 in upper state New York. Baptized at the age of 20, many in her tribal community were openly hostile to her acceptance of Christianity. The more she practiced her faith, the more her persecution increased. Concerned for her safety, respected Indian Catholics took her 400 miles away into Canada. At the Sault Sainte Marie Mission, Kateri blossomed in her faith. Kateri died at the age of 24 in 1680. Following her death, the scars from her childhood disease left her. This miraculous sign helped many of the Native Americans of that era to believe in Jesus and to embrace the Christian faith.

Everyone is called to be a saint.

Catholic and non-Catholic. Those who are recognized and those who live their life out of the spotlight. Those who enter religious life and lay people. The educated and the uneducated. The healthy and those who live with chronic suffering. Those who stay at home and those who become missionaries far from home. Native and non-native. Those from privilege and those from poverty. Everyone is called to a life of holiness and to a life of service to others.

Quyanna for your praying hands
We miss those praying hands
You are our angel that we needed from above
Gram, we miss you
Though we are thankful you are our angel
Thanks Gram for all your endless love
You are truly missed.

2012-13 Snow Removal Policy & Procedures

Listed below are the prioritized actions that the City of Nome will undertake during the 2012-2013 snow season. These actions are meant as a guide and DO NOT commit the City to any course of action other than that which is deemed to be in the best interests of safety and City resources.

During major blizzards and ground storms, City crews will stand by and only attempt to open streets as required in emergency situations

Once the storm has abated, every effort will be made to open fire lanes (one lane) on every street in town. Once fire lanes have been established, crews will begin to open major (school bus) routes to two lanes of traffic. Streets identified as priority are * East and West 5th Ave. * East 1st Ave. * West 2nd Ave. * West E Street * East K Street * Icy View Loop * East N Street * Steadman Street

Once major routes have been opened to two lanes of traffic, crews will begin opening the remaining streets to two lanes of traffic

Once the streets have been opened to two lanes of traffic, crews will systematically begin to widen, clean and haul snow to designated snow storage sites. Service areas will be rotated in order that all areas of town receive equal treatment during this clean up

Sanding of select streets will be performed by ADOT. Other streets will be sanded when conditions warrant and resources allow.

The major snow storage for the City of Nome will be: the snow storage site located off Greg Kruschek Avenue.

Once again these plans are meant as a guide. We will take actions contrary to this plan as necessary. We urge citizens of Nome to help us keep the streets safe and usable.

Some things that will help our efforts are:

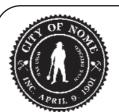

Cars should be parked off the rights-of-way as much as possible during the clearing and removal of snow; Obstructions (buildings, dog houses, snow machines, 4-wheelers, trash boxes, etc.) that prevent removal of snow should be moved farther on to private property if at all possible;

Be alert to the area of town in which we are working and, if at all possible, keep parked cars and traffic to a min-

Pushing of snow into the public right-of-way after a street has been cleared is discouraged.

After hours, on the weekends and holidays, City crews will be on-call as needed. Due to the limited resources within the City, local contractors will be utilized to provide additional manpower and equipment as necessary. If you have any questions, please feel free to contact Public Works Dept. at 443-5653. Thank you!

Suction dredge operators seek support for their interests

By Sandra L. Medearis

About 50 miners collected at Mini Convention Center last week for a family type meeting to voice experiences from the concluding summer mining season and to look forward to summer 2013.

The Nome Chamber of Commerce and the Alaska Mining Association sponsored the sit-down that featured two themes: airing regulations that miners felt nonconductive to their mining business and a hustle by the AMA for new members from the ranks of offshore suction dredgers.

No representatives of regulatory agencies attended the meeting held on Oct. 11.

"We will help anyone whether a member of the organization or not," Deantha Crockett, AMA executive director, said. "We have a responsibility to respond to needs of miners.

"Mining off shore and on shore are different, but we face the same issues on permits and community issues," she said.

AMA has a membership of about 1,400 statewide.

Munching food from the snack table, miners hashed out beefs which included miner-regulatory strife, lack of appreciation of revenue brought by miners, and the need for representation of a new gold mining sector—suction dredging offshore beneath Norton Sound.

The discussion started with miners needing representation on City of Nome panels—Planning Commission, Nome Common Council, and maybe most of all, Nome Port Commission.

"No one is inputting on behalf of the mining community," said Cliff McHenry.

"The mining community needs indoor people elected," Nikolai Ivanoff said. "Now when they start collecting money they don't know what it is to buy a dredge." Ivanoff, having worked for 13 years at Alaska Gold Co., has been appointed to the Nome Planning Commission to fill a vacated seat.

Meanwhile, gold buyer Ken Hughes has applied for an appointed Council seat to replace Mary Knodel who resigned effective Oct. 6. According to informal conversation following a recent Council meeting, some current Council members would like to hold off on that appointment until after a runoff election for two Council seats on Nov. 6. Such a delay would enable the Council to appoint one of the incumbent Council members-Stan Andersen or Randy Pomeranz - if either were to lose to a challenger. The Council, according to City law, has 30 days within which to appoint Knodel's successor-ending two days before the election.

Discussion produced other ideas: Those paid with government checks are operating in a parallel reality, Bob Hafner said. "As regards local politics, the economy is driven by government boards and former government employees," he said. "They don't understand the fiscal responsibility of operating a business."

Miners can deal locally with City politics; they need help with state and federal regulatory groups, Hafner said.

Roger that, Joe Horton said. Somehow, regulating agencies came up with the idea that his under-theice mining operation last winter threatened polar bear habitat. "They tacked a notice to my door that said to cease mining and get equipment off within three days or they would take my equipment."

There needs to be a working group of miners to educate regulators to actual mining practices in the field, several suggested.

At regulatory agencies, we have protectors of environment and wildlife, not managers.

Paul Richards of AMA stressed the need for the organization to grow in active members on behalf of mining interests. "Being members is great, but we need participation," he said. "We need you to educate regulators."

Chick Trainor said the same. "The only staying action I can see is getting behind a group."

Port users need to have the opportunity to use credit cards to pay for services. Currently, transient users must have cash.

The local AMA is made up mostly of placer and hard rock miners, with no summer meetings while suction dredgers are working for gold underwater, Mitch Erickson pointed out.

Regulators and the City refuse to acknowledge the money brought in by mining. Federal dollars are not coming in as they once did; as Alaskan benefactor [Sen. Ted Stevens] is dead. The City wants to defame, discriminate against and tax miners. "Well, they say, port users should have to pay more," beach miner Chick Trainor said. "I say, why don't you tap into benefits that have already come with mining?"

"A lot more attention has been drawn to mining than there used to be," said one miner. "If you like the way things are changing, you can thank Bering Sea Gold [TV show] and all the people who made it possible."

FREEZING UP— A whirlpool of ice signals the arrival of winter as the shore line of the Snake River begins to freeze up and boats are coming out of the water. This week, port employees are going to pull the floating docks and the channel buoys out of the water.

THE DOCK WALK

The boating, fishing and offshore gold dredging season is rapidly coming to an end as the water inside the Nome small boat harbor begins to show signs of freezing up.

Port employees are busy wrapping up business at the Nome Port and small boat harbor, readying the facilities for winter.

This week, they are pulling the floating docks and channel buoys out of the water and plan to haul their work boat, the Guardian, out and store it for the winter.

Harbormaster Joy Baker reports that last week, the Russian research boat Geo Arctic and the Canadian research boat Polar Prince completed their operations at the causeway to gear up for their scientific expeditions.

The Canadian icebreaker Sir Wilfrid Laurier was anchored outside the port on Oct. 8, and left last week.

The Vitus Marine tanker Moor was still anchored outside of Nome last week, transferring their last load of gas to their lighter barge for delivery.

The Nachik, a Crowley lighter fuel barge, came through for equipment. A last Crowley fuel delivery is yet expected to arrive to top off the harbor tanks.

Last week, a construction barge arrived in Nome to discharge construction equipment from a village to be stored in Nome for the winter.

The last Northland Services tug and barge for the season, the Polar Viking, arrived in Nome on Saturday and offloaded containers and equipment.

The last mainline barge for the season, Alaska Logistic's voyage 12-07, is still expected to arrive in Nome later on this week.

"The ice is forming quickly," Joy Baker said, which explains the busy hustle and bustle at the Nome Port and Small Harbor to square things away for the coming winter season.

PUMPKIN TIME—It's beginning to look a lot like Halloween as Nome residents decorate their front yards with carved pumpkins.

Bye, bye Wien Building

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome's favorite eyesore came cracking and splintering down under attack from City of Nome public works excavators Tuesday morning. Demolition started just before 10 a.m. The building was firewood in less than an hour, satisfying a ruling by Nome Common Council that saving the building was no longer on the table.

night to begin to demolish the derelict Wien Building Tuesday at first light. Mark Sackett, who bought the building for one dollar—actually quarters—and employees worked under floodlights late into the night salvaging windows from the doomed building.

The demolition to abate the building had been scheduled for Oct. 11.

However, last Friday City Manager Josie Bahnke told the Nugget that foul weather, a late fuel barge and work to close Port of Nome early before pending ice tied up crews and trumped the demolition schedule.

Other buildings, long on the abatement list as threats to safety and health, would also come down this week.

Tuesday morning, Bahnke cheered the Front Street beautification project with Allen Maxwell, building inspector.

She shared pieces of her birthday cake with passers-by who cheered when the building went flat.

AFN seeks federal legislation to protect hunting and fishing rights

Senator Murkowski promises Congressional hearing on subsistence issues

By Laurie McNicholas

Alaska Natives made a strong bid for new federal legislation to restore and protect their hunting, fishing and gathering rights at the Alaska Federation of Natives annual convention Oct. 18-20 at the Dena'ina Center in Anchorage.

Subsistence topped a list of 13 pressing issues preselected by tribal leaders throughout Alaska for a tribal conference hosted by AFN and the National Congress of American Indians on Oct. 17 at the Alaska Native Heritage Center in Anchorage.

The forum included a lively question and answer exchange among tribal leaders, most members of Gov. Sean Parnell's cabinet and staff representing all members of Alaska's Congressional delegation, according to Edward Thomas, president of the Central Council of Tlingit and Indian Tribes of Alaska.

In a report to AFN convention delegates, Thomas said suggestions for solving subsistence problems took most of the time available for a strategy session at the tribal forum. Participants called for repealing the section of the 1971 Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (ANCSA) that extinguished the aboriginal hunting and fishing rights of Alaska Natives.

Thomas said the forum had only enough time to address the second highest priority, energy and the high cost of living, before the meeting was adjourned at 4 p.m. so attendees could go to a subsistence rally at the Delaney Parkstrip in downtown An-

Nome Volunteer Fire Department celebrates first 75 years

By Sandra L. Medearis Part One of a three-part series

The Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. put on a grand gathering Saturday night as they celebrated 75 years of volunteer efforts to save lives, put out fires, conduct search and rescue operations, respond to hazardous material, and continually train to keep the community safe. The gathering at the Nome Rec Center's town gymnasium featured the pomp and circumstance of acknowledging years of service, the comfort of sitting down to a white table cloth dinner with family and friends, and renewing acquaintances with honored guests who have been pillars of the department in earlier

The celebration was a hometown affair, planned and put on by the members of the department. Nome-Beltz High School Choir sang "The Star Spangled Banner." Nome Chef Tim Stettinger cooked for a dozen hours, finishing the prime rib-halibut dinner just before the pledge of allegiance. For dessert, Linda Steiger decorated a table of large cakes in a NVFD theme featuring miniature vintage fire engines and the NVFD emblem. Al Burgo put on some tunes. The band "Usual Suspects" played for some serious cutting of the dance floor after dinner. NVFD officers Chief Matt Johnson, Jerry Steiger, Kevin Knowlton, Warren Little and others acknowledged the contributions of many years of volunteerism and public service

I just wanted to express my sincere delight on the stellar performance by the Taprarmiut Drummers & Dancers during AFN 2012. I also want to thank Morris Nashoanak Sr. for allowing those of us who do not fully reside physically in Stebbins to have been part of this seemingly once in a lifetime opportunity.

Everyone who participated showed excellent professionalism and were nothing shy of outstanding representation of our beautiful Yup'ik culture. The young ladies in high school were catapulted to the front of the stage during the performance by their elders. This showed such an enormous amount of support for our youth that could not be duplicated any other way.

The dialog and conversations that were held just before the performance was handled in such a cooperative and cohesive way, everyone seemed so excited and happy. I myself was overjoyed that Stebbins was even in Anchorage, let alone back stage ready to perform for the entire world to see.

I cannot amplify my gratitude to everyone who funded and supported this group. As a community, Stebbins should be proud of this group, the leaders, the fundraisers and all that contributed to make this trip possible. This was and is an excellent example of teamwork, leadership and dedication to fulfilling a goal by the members of this community.

I encourage the community of Stebbins to dream big and set goals, because as a team, anything can be achieved. Thank you so very much.

To the Editor:

What kind of culture are we creating for future generations? The 10/18 edition of Nome Nugget has some beautiful photography and the smiles are great. There is a negative tone towards the offshore mining and the reporting is highlighting misfortunes in the industry. This is a difficult business and no mention of the large amount of revenues these brave people bring into this remote community. A positive trend. I see no negative reporting surrounding the alcoholic status quo in this community despite the known destruction of family cohesion and individual integrity by rampant alcohol consumption. There are 21 reports of alcohol or substance abuse on the local police blotter yet not one of these stories made it to the front page because this is business as usual for Nome. Nothing about how more lives are permanently altered because of last week's abuse. The amount of tax revenues received from alcohol sales last year doesn't come anywhere near what it cost to just apprehend the abusers let alone jailing them and treating them for what ultimately becomes a permanent medical problem. How are these costs being paid for? The status quo offers a bar and liquor store to smooth out the problem making a few individuals rich. This is the culture Nome lives in. It has been this way for over 112 years and counting. Is this a good example for the children? One of the more interesting reads in your paper is "A Look at the Past." How about a more positive look at our future? What kind of culture are we creating for future generations.

Déja vu All Over Again

Norton Sound Health Corporation fired another CEO last week, just like a year ago, and again before that and yet again and again before that. It's become an annual event for the past several years. It's an old story and something is radically wrong with this situation. The Norton Sound Region has a hospital board with the Red Queen yelling, "Off with their heads."

Norton Sound Health Corporation has no leadership. It's like a car racing downhill with no steering wheel. The NSHC board is suffering from an outrageous abuse of power and petty reactions. A casual observer would wonder how so many board members could do so much damage. One would hope it could clean its own house, reduce its unwieldy size and get serious about the business of providing a high level of professionalism and reliable service to all the citizens of this area. It's health care, not just payroll that should be the goal of NSHC.

Good health is a community concern. We are all here together and as we move into a brand new hospital facility we need steering and guidance for the process. We also need to get past the reputation for unstable leadership. We can't afford to continue with irrational behavior. Let's have some professionalism and stop the revolving door of CEOs. We need stability. - N.L.M.-

A Last Look at the Past: The 1900 Nome Gold Rush

By Laura Samuelson, Director, Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum

For the past 21 weeks of Nome's brief summer, the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum has been pleased to present the diary of Wilfred A. Mc-Daniel Sr. Wilfred and his brother Ed were two of the 20,000 Argonauts who streamed to the Nome Gold Rush in 1900. The Museum offered Wilfred's insights as an unabridged seat of the pants blueprint of what the dredgers and beach miners could expect mining for gold in 2012 Nome, Alaska. We are grateful to Wilfred's daughter Irene McDaniel and her spouse, Robert Johnson as well as son Wilfred Jr. and Lois Mc-Daniel who donated the photographs, writings and artifacts collected between 1899 and 1907. The family preserved and protected Wilfred's legacy for 93 years until the collection was donated to the people of Nome in 2001.

We conclude our series with a burning question: Should the boys stay in Nome or go south for the winter? Brother Ed voted with his gold nuggets and bought two tickets to San Francisco on the Senator. They had two days to close up camp and high tail it to Nome...

LOCAL

Alaska beckons By Wilfred A. McDaniel

On the morning of the 25th, the tent was taken down and with stove and cooking utensils, was cached with our other possessions. In the afternoon, carrying our luggage and blanket rolls, we mushed into Nome.

The town was alive with the great influx of miners from the creeks and distant points, some making preparations for the long winter, others, like ourselves, arranging transportation to "The Outside." Many were utterly discouraged, others in high spirits, according to the smiles of the Goddess Fortune!

On the evening of the 25th, from the heaving deck of the Senator, we saw the twinkling lights of Nome gradually fade away, as the Senator turned her bow southward, and it was with a feeling of regret that we saw the last gleam dim out, as the mists closed in.

sunny California, and home, together with future plans for the coming spring, when the call of the North would lure us back to that desolate, but fascinating land!

So, dear miners of the golden sands of 2012 Nome, heed Wilfred McDaniels' advice from 1900. It's time for Nomeites to head into eight months of the frozen Arctic winter and it's time for many of you to head south to warmer climes.

Until we meet again, we wish you happy trails and a drier summer in

I was a member of the committee to select the replacement of our District's state representative, Richard Foster, when he passed away. Now, because of redistricting, our choice, Neal Foster, no longer represents the Bethel/Wade Hampton area.

The choice for your new District, in my opinion, is clear: David Guttenberg. Representative Guttenberg, even before redistricting was and continues to be a champion for those of us who live in rural areas, on and off the road system. Even before the new District maps were on the drawing board, Representative Guttenberg, as both a state Representative and as a Democratic party leader, was a very strong voice to ensure members of all areas of our District had seats at the selection committee table.

Like you, for years I have watched Rep. Guttenberg on Gavel to Gavel and have witnessed his dedication to our issues, real people issues both social and monetary, for both rural and urban citizens. For over 20 years, I have interacted with him in person, by phone, and by email and have found him ALWAYS responsive to my concerns. He (and his staff) listens, actively seeks input from all sides, and weighs the information before acting and voting on issues.

Even before his first election to the state House, Representative Guttenberg was a strong and active supporter of Coastal Zone Management and was an outspoken advocate for the recent Ballot Initiative to reestablish it into

I live in Nome so I can't vote for Representative Guttenberg but if I lived in his District, I absolutely would.

To the editor,

Last Monday, Dan Harrelson was on the witness stand in the Kotzebue Superior Court, having been sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, complaining about my letters published in the Nugget. Dan told the court that I lied when I said in my September 20, 2012 letter that NSEDC paid him $425 an hour.

When I went back and doublechecked the records, it turns out that I did make an error in my hourly rate calculation

Dan got paid for 25 hours per week during 2007, not 5 hours. During 2008, he was paid $118,909 for working five hours per week, which is $457.34 per hour. During 2009 he worked five hours per week for $111,763 which is $429.86 per hour and during 2010, NSEDC paid him $109,348 for working five hours per week which is $420.57 per hour. The 2011 report isn't

Therefore, my sentence should have read, during the three years from 2008-10; Dan Harrelson was paid $340,020 by NSEDC for working five hours per week, which works out to $435.92 per hour. That's good pay.

How much Dan gets paid is reported every year to the IRS in Part VII of NSEDC's income tax returns. If you want to check for yourself, NSEDC is required by the IRS code to make its income tax returns available for public inspection. You can stop by their office and ask to see them.

pital CEO Deven Parlikar was sad and prophetic. His comments about discriminatory corporate governance and retribution apply just as well to NSEDC. I don't know Devon or the specific facts leading to his firing but what he describes is an all too familiar story out here. Unfairness and discrimination in the management of the public institutions that Congress created to help people in the bush prevents them from achieving their full potential and that hurts everybody.

Forty years after ANCSA, we still haven't found a way to govern the corporations Ted Stevens created in a nondiscriminatory way. Uncle Ted had an amazing ability to squeeze money out of Congress for programs to improve life in rural Alaska but he didn't give us much guidance on how we were supposed to run these government created monopolies and treat people fairly at the same time.

I want to repeat the quote from Martin Luther King, "In the end, we will remember not the words of our enemies, but the silence of our friends." I understand why people keep their mouths shut. They have reason for being afraid. There will be retaliation against them for speaking up but there is a huge cost in sitting silent. Outsiders aren't going to make governance of our publicly owned corporations better for us. A big problem is that nobody really knows how to do it yet but doing nothing, and acquiescing to the dysfunctionality that we live with today will be a serious failure in our responsibility to future generations. As Sky Starkey told AFN last week, "Other people can't be in charge of managing your life.'

AFN presses for legislation problems to an AFN workshop on Food Security and Management of Subsistence Resources" moderated by Rosita Worl, president, Sealaska Heritage Institute, and Myron Naneng, president, Association of Village Council Presidents.

The goals are: "(1) Full and lasting federal protections for our hunting, fishing and gathering way of life, and (2) A co-equal role in managing the fish, wildlife and other renewable resources that we rely upon for our economic and cultural existence.

Leading action plan items include (1) advocating to revoke ANCSA's extinguishment of aboriginal hunting and fishing rights; (2) seeking federal legislation to restore and protect Native hunting and fishing rights in Alaska, beginning with a Congressional oversight hearing on the status of Native rights to food security and self-determination; and (3) seeking legislative, administrative and policy changes to mandate a meaningful role for Alaska Natives in the federal management program, including tribal compacting and contracting of significant aspects of the federal management program to tribal organizations.

Why legislation is needed

A proclamation accompanying the goals and action plan to address subsistence problems says when ANCSA was enacted. Congress emphasized that it expected both the State of Alaska and the Secretary of the Interior to take any action necessary to protect the subsistence needs of the Natives.

"Alaska's expanding population increased competition for fish and game" reads the proclamation. 'Neither the State nor the Secretary of the Interior fulfilled Congress' expectation that Native subsistence would be protected. Congress moved to protect the subsistence way of Alaska Natives and enacted Title VIII of the Alaska National Interest Land Conservation Act (ANILCA).

Again, our leaders pressed for explicit protection of 'Native' hunting and fishing rights, but the State objected. Ultimately a law was crafted to provide a subsistence priority for 'rural residents' with the expectation that the State would enact laws that conformed to federal requirements. Regrettably, Congress' goal of ensuring the continuation of Alaska Natives' customary and traditional way of life was dealt a death blow in 1990, when the Alaska Supreme Court declared the State's rural priority law unconstitutional.'

The outcome of the court's decision led to 20 years of dual federal and State management. The proclamation cites the following evidence that ANILCA has failed to protect the Native subsistence way of life:. Subsistence harvests have been marginalized by other uses and ineffective management, Native Alaskans have been criminalized for feeding their families and communities, and they have been penalized for practicing their ancient traditions.

Current subsistence con-

Workshop panelist Kathryn Martin, vice president of land and resources for Athna Inc., said her corporation has 1,700 shareholders and the number is growing due to open enrollment. People from around the world are descending on Ahtna's land to hunt and to fish for Copper River red salmon, and shareholders fear for their physical safety while hunting, she noted. Much of the corporation's lands are accessible by highway. Ahtna established a land protection program seven years ago, Martin added.

Martin said Ahtna's fight for shareholders' hunting and fishing rights is waged silently and alone. "The federal government has taken the easy way out by passively adopting state regulations," she added.

Naneng noted disastrous declines in the numbers of Chinook salmon returning to the Yukon and Kuskokwim rivers. He said citations issued this year to subsistence fishermen for fishing during a closure are still pending, and some have been reduced to infractions. He said the State seems to be making an effort to get the fishermen to plead out to a crime for getting food.

In a pretrial conference held Oct. 16, the fishermen refused the State's plea deals and opted for trials rather than plead guilty for subsistence fishing for their families, according to a report by Angela Denning-Barnes for KYUK radio in Bethel.

She said the State reduced charges against 22 of the fishermen because their crime was limited to fishing with the wrong net size. They are being represented free of charge by the Northern Justice Project, a private law firm focusing on civil rights issues, she added.

Denning-Barnes said several others who fished on June 20 during a 12-day closure as part of an organized effort by several Kuskokwim villages are charged with misdemeanors for other fishing violations and are represented by public defenders. She said each fisherman will be tried separately in trials beginning Oct. 29 in Bethel District Court.

Naneng told workshop participants that Sen. Lisa Murkowski visited Bethel early this month and said a Senate oversight hearing on subsistence will be held this winter in Bethel or elsewhere in Alaska. "As soon as we know, we'll tell you," he

Senator Murkowski confirmed her plans for a Senate hearing on subsistence during an open dialogue with convention delegates that she and Congressmen Don Young conducted on Friday afternoon. "I will commit to you we will have a hearing on subsistence," she stated. She said she doesn't yet know whether the hearing will be held in Washington, D.C., or whether it will be conducted by the Indian Affairs committee, Energy committee or Commerce committee.

Young acknowledged the subsistence issue has festered for a long time. He said he prefers that Alaska Natives and the State be involved rather than the federal government. He said he thinks a Yukon River council involving every Yukon River village should be formed to address salmon management. Young urged convention delegates to seek fish and game management authority on their own lands—the 44 million acres of land allocated to Alaska Natives under ANCSA.

AFN convention delegates adopted resolutions calling for the establishment of inter-tribal and Alaska Native fish commissions; for a Congressional oversight hearing on self-determination, including Alaska Native hunting and fishing rights; for funds from the Alaska Legislature for essential research on

Halloween event aims to help feed the hungry

By Diana Haecker

The Nome Community Center along with the City of Nome Parks and Recreation department teamed up to organize a new Halloween event in the absence of the "usual" D.A.W.N. Halloween Haunted House spectacle.

The D.A.W.N. event had been an institution for many years. Booths of games used to line the walls at the National Guard Armory; Nomeites dressed as outhouses, vampires and all sorts of hideous creatures competed in costume contests.

The event was organized by a group of volunteers centered around D.A.W.N. aka "Drugs Aren't Wanted in Nome" but the glue that held them together disintegrated with the passing of the group's, founder Connie Madden.

Todd Hindman is the lone person still involved with D.A.W.N. He said while the non-profit still exists, the organization only puts on the SouperBowl event to raise money for the improvement of East End Park and to support other groups focusing on kid's activities. "Instead of organizing individual events for kids, we raise money for activities that kids are involved in," Hindman said.

D.A.W.N. supported a Nome swimming program, the Native Youth Olympics and the Nome-Beltz Drama Club, to name a few. For the past three years, Hindman had a hard time finding people interested in helping with the Halloween event, but Nome Community Center's Danielle Sylvester had been actively involved in youth activities and picked up where D.A.W.N. left off.

Together with Jeremy Master from the City's Rec Center, she is now organizing a Halloween Family Fun Night at the Nome Rec Center.

"It won't be the carnival that D.A.W.N. put on," Sylvester said.

There won't be any booths with games, but there will be a Haunted Walk outside the Rec Center and a lot of fun activities inside. Sylvester said. "We plan on three guided walks at different times, but they might be a bit scary for the younger kids.'

Inside the Rec Center, there will be creepy stations and scary feeler boxes; the movie "Hokus Pokus" will be playing throughout the evening and, yes, there will be a costume contest.

In one of the side rooms, a fortune teller will do her best to predict the future and in another room, there will be a scary story teller.

In addition, a bounce house will be set up. Norton Sound Health Corp.'s injury prevention program is planning on ironing reflective tape on people's jackets.

The price of admission is a can of Food Bank director Paula Davis has been struggling to keep some food on the Food Bank's shelves that were stripped almost bare this summer. The Halloween event has traditionally been the biggest fund and food-raiser for the Food Bank. Especially this year, the donations are much needed.

Davis said that this summer was busier than before. More people than ever used the services of the Food Bank. Davis said that the Food Bank served 217 people in June 2011. That number jumped to 246 in June 2012.

She noticed a lot of out-of-town "clients" were using the Food Bank, especially seasonal miners who spent the summer in Nome.

Davis said if it weren't for the frequent donations of bulk and left-over food by the research boats that anchor in Nome and restock here, she would have had a hard time handing out food to folks.

The Food Bank of Alaska sends

Strict rules apply on how and how often it is given out to people. A single person gets just as much as a family of three.

Davis said it depletes resources quickly when single men, who do appear to share living quarters and transportation, each claim their full allotment under Food Bank rules:

one bag of staple foods like rice, corn or oatmeal per month. Food donated from local sources does not have to be accounted for as strictly as goods coming in from the government.

About 20 local families are signed up to receive food at the Food Bank.

Davis said that summer was the busiest time for the Food Bank. The least busy times are the months of January, February and March.

Locally donated food, Davis said, can just be handed out whenever it's

Now, those shelves are empty. This, she hopes, will be remedied with the upcoming Halloween Fun Night at the Rec Center, where admission is a can of food to keep up

Emergency responders discuss food shortage in case of emergency events

By Diana Haecker

Back in the days, when food arrived in bulk via barge, Nomeites stocked up on canned goods or bulk and were never caught going hungry during emergency events such as violent fall storms.

Nowadays, the shelves in the stores empty out pretty fast when Nome is cut off from jet air traffic for a few days, as was the case during a spell of bad, rainy and foggy weather during the closure of the main runway in August.

DOT&PF Nome Airport manager Bob Madden said during last week's Local Emergency Planning Commission meeting that roughly 100,000 pounds of freight come to Nome on a daily basis. If the pattern is disrupted, the local grocery stores are not getting the groceries to restock their shelves. And that means that people used to go shopping on an as-needed basis, don't get their groceries. "We don't stock food as we used to," said Madden.

"When we had bad weather and the runway closure, the event precluded jets from coming in and pretty soon we had half a million pounds of freight sitting in Anchorage," Madden said.

LEPC chair Tom Vaden also reported back from an emergency preparedness conference held in early October that focused on lessons learned from the 2011 tornado disaster in Joplin, Missouri. An EF-5 tornado hit the town of 50,000 souls in May 2011, leaving at least 116 people dead and a six-mile swath roughly half a mile wide. A hospital was destroyed, another severely damaged.

Vaden said that the tornado turned the city into rubble, leaving people without any recognizable streets or direction, making it hard for first responders to get to people for help.

While a tornado is not likely to happen here in the Nome area, Vaden said, there are potentially two catastrophic events that could strike in Nome: a tidal wave and ashfall from a volcano eruption. The latter would mean that air traffic to and from Nome would be interrupted and hence no groceries or goods would be arriving.

Vaden reminded the commission to put the word out that people should have enough of the necessary groceries, fresh water and medications to last for three to seven days in an emergency.

He added that the problem for smaller communities around Nome is exacerbated if cargo doesn't make it into Nome, it most certainly won't make it to the villages.

Vaden reminded the first responders of a training exercise with the scenario of an active shooter on Oct.

23. Airport manager Bob Madden added that there is an airport table top emergency training exercise scheduled for Oct. 29, simulating a disaster at the airport.

CHIEF'S NOTES

By John Papasodora Nome Police Chief

I have been living and working in Nome as your Chief of Police now for a little over three years. By Nome standards, that still makes me a newcomer, but I've grown to respect our community for the solid core values that don't exist in so many other places. Nome is a place where people care and will get involved. Countless times, we've received calls about people who are in distress, who are depressed, or just need some help getting through a tough time, and we have never failed to find someone who was willing to step in and make sure that they had what they needed. That is a sense of community and selfless giving that is rare these days. The people of Nome should be proud for who they are, what they stand for, and the values they hold dear.

Every once in a while, those values get taken advantage of. There are many good people out there who just want to do the right things for the right reasons. They give and want nothing in return. My friend Charlie Painter is such a person. He is consistently the 'nicest' guy you would want to know. You can see Charlie at the Post Office or around town. He always has a chuckle, a grin or will give the little extra effort to make a situation work. I spent a lot of time working with Charlie rebuilding the hockey rink and got to know him a bit. He is a hard worker and dedicated to giving the kids in the community a great place to play and learn skills that promote a healthy lifestyle. As a group, the NHL (Nome Hockey League) gives a lot to make the rink work –purely as volunteers. On the weekends, you can see up to 40 young children playing on the ice. It gives us all value to see kids enjoying themselves, playing outside, and getting exercise. But Charlie gives quite a bit more than anyone else.

Last week, we had our first ever burglary reported at the hockey building. I was in Anchorage at the time when I received a text from Charlie. He had gone over to the rink to work on a few projects that we had going and found that someone broke into the hockey building and stole his miter saw, his drill, Wilson Bourdon's drills and my personal drill. I was shocked! Though I have the general reality view of most law enforcement officers who have been doing the job for 27 plus years, I never had a clue that anyone would ever break into the hockey building and steal the tools being used by volunteers to do something good for the community. This was not the Nome that I have grown to admire and I could only think that this couldn't have been done by anyone from Nome. I hope that as we investigate this crime, that I am proven right and that the ideals of the community haven't changed so drastically that this kind of behavior will be toler-

But what was amazing about the whole thing was Charlie's reaction. He wasn't concerned about his stuff – he was concerned because someone else's stuff was gone. He told me, "I hope they needed the saw and will put it to good use." Quite an attitude for a fellow that just lost a $300 miter saw and $100 drill set.

The message here is that Nome is a great community where if someone needs something, they just need to ask. Most of us will gladly give or loan so that people can have what they need. But please pay attention because the old ways may be changing. We may be coming to the point where you have to live like you're in the big city – watching your stuff all

Nanooks wrestlers win five first place finishes at Bush Brawl

By Stephen Palmatier

The Nanooks, coming off their slow season debut two weeks ago at home in the Nome Inviational, looked for improvement away from their own surroundings. Last weekend, they did just that. The Nanooks got five first place finishes, two of them in the junior high levels and three in the high school level.

The Nanooks, who had two champions with Emery Booshu and James Horner in their home tournament, showed that they had some top wrestlers but needed to prove that they were a well-balanced wrestling team.

The Nanooks came out with champions in the junior high 120pound weight class in Josh Cannon and Timothy James in the 130-pound class. For high school, they had Alex Grey take the title in the 98-pound class, Leif Erikson in the 113-pound class and Emery Booshu in the 132pound class. Since Booshu was the only Nanook champion two weeks ago at tournament in Nome, the wins were quite surprising.

The other champions for the high school weight classes were Colton Sieh of Kotzebue in the 106-pound class, Avery Chiklak of Bethel in the 120-class, Josh Mendenhall of Bethel in the 126-class, Gary Eakin of Kotzebue at 138-pounds, Scott Hansen of Kotzebue in the 145pound class, Brayton Lieb of Bethel in the 152-class, Trevour Chavez of Bethel in the 160-pound class, Devon Phillips of Kotzebue in the 170-pound class, Issac Peacock of Kotzebue at 182-pounds, Shyler Johnson of Unalakleet at 195 pounds, Ben Voss of Barrow at 220pounds, and Bruce Crow of Bethel in the 285-pound class.

The Nanooks also earned three second place finishes in the high school weight classes: Bobby Pate in the 106-pound class, Chris Harvey in the 160-pound class and Russell

Smith in the 220-pound class. Also, Nome got four third place finishes: one in the junior high level with Wilson Hoogendorn in the 105-pound class and three in high school, James Horner in the 138-pound level, Junvor Erikson in the 152-pound class and Joe Cross in the 170-pound

With Nome having earned three titles, third only to Bethel and Kotzebue with five each, and 12 third place or better finishes, the Nanooks have to be happy with their performance. It will be something that they can build on for the upcoming meets and the rest of the season. The Nanooks will not have quite the luxury of rest this week as they get right back into action this weekend at the ACS Tournament in Anchorage in what should be their toughest overall competition this season.

Unalakleet triumphs in Mixed-6 Tourney

By Stephen Palmatier

Do you enjoy watching teams having fun while competing? Do you enjoy seeing the chemistry of boys and girls playing on the same team? If you said 'Yes' to both, then you would have wanted to see the Nome Mixed-6 tournament, which took place last weekend. Unalakleet claimed the champions title, defeating Ambler in four sets.

A small but intense crowd cheered on teams from all over the region, including Unalakleet, Ambler, Nome, Brevig Mission, Elim and White

The first evening of action consisted of pool play matches of two sets each after which they were divided into brackets

Early on, Unalakleet, Ambler and Elim were the teams to make a mark for themselves, winning 6, 6 and 4 sets respectively, qualifying as the top three seeds in the bracket. Meanwhile, on the flip side, the two teams representing the home Nome squad, to want only a few sets total, qualifying near the bottom.

The next day, the tournament elimination games kicked off, then turned into 'best of 5' format, where Unalakleet defeated White Mountain in three sets, 25-12, 25-20, and 25-19. Ambler won also in straight sets against Elim, 25-12, 25-17, and 25-20. These matches set up the championship game between Ambler vs.

Unalakleet and the third place consolation game between White Mountain and Elim.

In the third place game, Elim took the first set, 25-13. After that, the match became very competitive as Elim took the second set, 29-27 and then dropped the third set, 13-25. However, after the poor third set of play, Elim was able to finish the deal, winning the fourth set convincingly,

With Elim the third place finisher, all that was to be determined were the first and second place finishers. At first, it seemed that it might be Ambler as they took the opening set, 25-21. After the opening set however, Unalakleet turned it around as they came back to win three straight sets, 25-10, 25-17 and 25-12.

From the opening serve to the last strike of the ball, Unalakleet seemed to be the most dominant team in the tournament and the result showed it.

If nothing else, for some of the teams such as the Nome JV squad, it was a chance to play in competitive matches, which varsity games do not allow for. All eves continue to be on the top seeded Lady Nanooks varsity squad who are scheduled to compete in the regional tournament in Barrow

Roseann Timbers and Stuart Dennis named to statewide Elders and Youth Council at AFN convention

AFW

By Laurie McNicholas

A new statewide Elders and Youth Council was created at the 2012 Elders and Youth Conference held Oct. 15-17 at the Dena'ina Civic and Convention Center in Anchorage. Elected to serve on the council for Bering Straits Native Corp. were Elder Representative Roseann Timbers and alternate Loretta Cox, and Youth Representative Stuart Dennis and alternate Andy Piscoya.

The conference theme was "Native Knowledge, Respecting and Owning Our Native Culture."

This year, a night of cultural celebration was included in the event for the first time.

Sponsored by the First Alaskans Institute, the conference drew about 1,200 registered participants from across Alaska

Each participant was able to attend two of 18 workshops. Nine workshops ran concurrently in each of the first and second workshop sessions on Monday afternoon.

Seven workshops focused on health, wellness and safety activities.

One workshop focused on the healing power of stories and using digital media to tell stories.

Participants in separate workshop learned how to harvest, prepare and use medicinal plants.

A discussion of ways the Native community can improve and own the education system took place in one of five workshops on leadership and education. Elders and youth constructed their own rap based on the theme of respect and shared it with each other at one of four workshops on culture, values and language.

Participants in workshops on land, law and policy learned their rights as U.S citizens and discussed a legal case related to their right to receive a free, effective education.

A popular community art project at the conference engaged passersby in adding paint to large canvases depicting individuals in traditional attire from five Native Alaskan groups—Aleut, Athabascan, Inupiat, Tlingit and Yupik. Yupik artist Philip Charette drew the portraits of persons whose photos were attached to the canvases. Charette was among featured speakers at the conference with an address titled, "Fostering a Lifelong Application and Commitment to Alaska Native Values."

Time was set aside for Men's and Women's Houses, a popular opportunity to discuss opportunities and challenges faced by each gender which was introduced at the 2011

Elders and Youth Conference.

Elder Carrie Herman said when she was growing up in Mekoryuk on Nunivak Island, men slept in a big log house where Elders talked to young men and taught them to make tools; women taught girls domestic skills in a little sod house.

Carrie and her husband, Sam Herman, were Elder keynote speakers at the conference.

The conference included language circles, breakout sessions for participants in eight language groups, Aleut, Alutiiq, Athabascan, Haida, Inupiaq, Tlingit, Tsimshian and Yup'ik.

Youth keynote speaker Peter Squartsoff said when he joined an Alutiiq circle at an Elders and Youth Conference three years ago, he found that no one knew the language or the past of his people.

"I was struck by how limited we are with our language," he said. "We lacked resources."

Peter said he returned to Port Lions and told an Alutiiq teacher that an Alutiiq songbook is needed. "I worked at it for two and one-half years," Peter noted. "I did not know a half note or a quarter note. Today I'm glad to say I've transcribed more than 42 songs, both traditional and modern, and some Yup'ik songs. I am an Alutiiq dancer and book writer."

"When I was growing up, my father told me, "Provide for your people, help your community," Peter continued. "At first I did not know who my people are. Are they in Ouzinkie, Kodiak, Anchorage? I came up with the answer. I wanted to help my people, and they are the Alutiiq people.

"You never know what you will become in future," Peter told youths at the conference. "Two years ago in high school I wanted to become a chef, and I will go to college for it, but I also want to learn my language and revitalize it.'

Peter works for the Native Village of Afognak as an Alutiiq language mentor. He mentors students at Kodiak High School and at Kodiak Community College, where he is a full-time student, and teaches anyone who wants to learn the language.

Educational reform sought

A workshop on "Educational Reform—Our Vision for the Future of Education" continued the work AFN delegates started in 2011 to engage the State of Alaska in a new and different way with Alaska Native people. Gloria O'Neill, president and CEO of Cook Inlet Tribal Council, moderated the workshop.

Five statements developed at the workshop were presented to AFN delegates with a request to deem the statements true or false. A large majority of about 500 delegates found each of the following statements to be true. (1) Native control over school programs is critical to achieving Native students' success. (2) A culturally relevant curriculum is vital to Native student success. (3) Regional and district schools run by Alaska Native people provide one opportunity to Native student success. (4) Alaska Native students need academic rigor and high expectations wherever they are. (5) Alaska Native organizations should have control of education systems, as they have with the ANCSA corporations and health care.

AFN delegates adopted a resolution to amend the Alaska Native Education Equity Act and to use all legislative tools to ensure that funding is administered by Alaska Native organizations to improve education for Alaska Native youth and maximize leadership and involvement of Alaska Native organizations in such Late Friday afternoon, Senator Lisa Murkowski took testimony on new culturally-relevant approaches to the education of Alaska Native children from an invited panel of educators during a two-hour field hearing of the U.S. Senate Health. Education, Labor and Pensions Committee at the Dena'ina Center in Anchorage.

Other workshop topics

Other well-attended work sessions at the AFN convention were "Strong Native Peoples—In Body, Sprit and Mind," moderated by Katherine Gottlieb, Southcentral Foundation; "Energy for Our Communities," moderated by Deborah Vo, Alaska Energy Authority; and "Native Community's Relationship with the State of Alaska," moderated by Reggie Joule, retired Alaska State legislator and newly elected mayor of the Northwest Arctic Borough.

started the show as emcee introducing honored guests and reading a history of the department that was followed by personal anecdotes from firefighters.

Frank Richardson, with many years of service with the department, accompanied by wife Dolores Richardson, came from Anchorage as an honored guest. Richardson gave a fascinating account of the restoration of the 1937 Chevrolet fire engine that was abandoned, then unearthed and lovingly restored. The shiny red vehicle sat under spotlights as centerpiece of the vintage firefighting equipment displayed.

Before the celebration, firefighters drove the treasured fire truck to the stairs of the Rec Center and raised it with forklifts. The City of Nome's public works department had to remove the door and it's casing to ease the vehicle onto the floor. The beautifully restored vehicle drew people with irresistible magnetism to its side for photographs.

Curtis E. Jacobs attended as honored guest and described a young boy's memories of firefighters in Nome during the 1930's. Jacobs' father, Curtis Jacobs, helped to organize the early Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. that received its charter from the City in 1937.

Curtis E. Jacobs recalls the day the 1937 rig rolled off the barge at

"I remember in 1937 when my two sisters-Audrey and Winonaand I went down to the jetty to watch them unload that 1937 fire truck that is in the hall here. About a week later, the whole town turned out to Lomen's dock to watch them fire up the engine for the first time," Jacobs said. "They tried out all the hoses and equipment to make sure everything worked. The town was happy. I was seven years old."

There was a fire rig in town before the arrival of the shiny red Chevrolet. Horses powered that fire wagon. "This was the first mobilized truck in town," Jacobs said. "It was quite a deal."

The motorized fire engine was purchased for $3,700 F.O.B. Seattle and put aboard a barge operated by Alaska Steam Company. The company charged Nome a nominal fee of $50, according to a history presented at the dinner by John K. Handeland.

There was a brand new fire station built along side the North Pole Bakery that was also the City Hall, according to Jacobs.

"Mrs. McLain was the city clerk. She had her office up on the second floor. The basement was the police department. I used to go down there and play cards with W.W. Laws and his assistant," Jacobs said.

After the arrival of the 1937 Chevrolet, the town sold the horses for $9 and modified the fire station to accommodate the motorized vehicle, Handeland said.

About 16 men got together and presented a fire department constitution to the city council calling for the formation of a volunteer fire department. The council approved the resolution creating the Nome Volunteer Fire Department on Oct. 11, 1937.

Nome Volunteer Fire Department has been staffed by hundreds of dedicated volunteers over the years who have dedicated their time and risked their lives for the safety of our community," Handeland said. "Since its inception, we have relied on the dedication of the volunteers to protect citizens from the perils of fire."

The Nome Fire Hall on Bering Street resulted from the work of department volunteers. "From the foundation, to the walls, to the roof, to the hose tower, to the concrete pavement in front, this was all accomplished as a labor of love by your local firemen. Distribution of fire protectors has been responsible for lives saved," Handeland noted.

The fire department has modernized equipment and personnel. When it was started, the charter specified the department to comprise 20 men.

However, the membership in recent years has lobbied to expand the ranks to include both genders. Penny Jack was the first woman to join; Mackenzie Oles is currently an active mem-

These were times before the town had modern water and sewer services, Frank Richardson said. The fire engine had to load water from a saltwater pump.

Richardson joined the department in June 1958. One day the chief walked over to where Richardson was working and told him the department needed someone to run the water pump.

"'You look like you'd be a good man," Richardson remembered him saying. "That's how I joined the department."

A salt water line ran the length of Front Street. The pipes had to be checked and emptied each fall lest they freeze up and be useless in

The department hooked the hose to a stanchion in front of the old city hall and ran it many blocks to the truck to put out a fire.

By and by, the 1937 Chevrolet fire truck went out to pasture with a series of private owners, then was eventually abandoned.

However, some firemen, now retired or passed on, began to badger Richardson to help them restore the derelict vehicle.

"No, I don't think so," he told them. "That truck is in pretty rough

Indeed it was.

"When it was sitting on the beach, someone had come along and used everything that would break for target practice," Richardson said.

The men kept after him to take up the project. Finally, he succumbed. The fire truck had been stored in the old Nome Public Schools district office across from the Nome Fire Hall. Getting it out of the building posed a problem, Richardson told the anniversary gathering. It hadn't moved because the brake drums had frozen to the brake shoes. The building had sunk since the fire truck went in so the doors wouldn't open. The furnace hadn't been running for five years.

Although a dozen or so men worked on the truck, Richardson wanted to credit a lot of the effort to firemen Bobby Morris, Tommy Johnson, Chuck Lewis and Bobby Lewis, "all gone on," Richardson said. "I am glad to see the old truck has become an old Nomeite. There's only one way to become an old Nomeite. That's when everybody who knows why you came here has left Nome one way or another.'

Part II of this series will tell how the volunteers removed the fire truck from the building and recovered it from neglect.

As master of ceremonies, Fire Chief Matt Johnson officiated at the retirement of NVFD Capt. Warren Little, who has answered fire calls for the past four decades. Little went to the front of the gymnasium with his wife Martina, to accept a ceremonial firefighter's ax bearing the NVFD seal.

Little, retired fire chief, joined the department in 1973. He praised the department.

He was proud of his service as chief and proud of the NVFD, he said. "We can hold our own with any fire department in the country, professional or volunteer," said Little.

NVFD honored six firefighters who had retired since the last ceremony in 2010: Pat Johanson, Clifford Johnson, Charlie Painter, Mike Thomas, Stan Morgan and Jim West

Nome's current Volunteer Fire

Department has 42 members who protect approximately 14 square miles and about 3,500 people.

Firefighter Chuck Fagerstrom, unable to attend the party, sent his regards and congratulations. With the extensive training and dedication of NVFD, "we can stand tall among full-time firefighters," Fagerstrom said. He noted that volunteers join the department because they share a motivation to give back to their community in public service. Fagerstrom has served for 44 years and is the oldest firefighter in the state holding a Firefighter 2 certificate.

Gov. Sean Parnell sent his congratulations on NVFD's 75th anniversary to Chief Matt Johnson and the community of Nome. "I am grateful for the department's commitment to readiness and quick reaction in the community of Nome. Thank you for your dedication and devotion for making the state of Alaska a better and safer place to live," Parnell wrote.

Sen. Mark Begich also sent his congratulation on the NVFD milestone. "Fire departments work hard to keep our communities safe. They provide crucial community service, save lives and educate communities on fire safety and prevention. Nome's volunteer firefighters put their lives on the line day after day and are true heroes. Congratulations to the firefighters who have kept the community safe year after year," Begich said in his statement.

Next week: Part II, NVFD history.

Debra Annie Kimoktoak

In loving memory of our beloved mother, daughter, sister, aunt, niece and cousin Debra Annie Kimoktoak. Debra was born July 12, 1964 at the family's fish camp at Ungalik and passed away September 24, 2012 in a boating accident.

Debra graduated from Koyuk Malimut School in May of 1982. She started working at a young age as a summer youth worker. She also attended Alaska Technical Center in Kotzebue. She worked various jobs as well as being on the firefighter crew for Koyuk. She served as the Mayor for the City of Koyuk and also was a City Council member where she learned and loved serving with fellow member, Auntie Irene. She also worked at the City as Utility Clerk.

Her greatest loves and accomplishments were her six beautiful children. They were a blessing to her. Patrick and Steven also blessed her with grandchildren, Cameron, Bubba and her newest granddaughter Tasha, which were her pride and joy. She was proud of her son Earl for graduating from high school and was very excited to see him continue his education at University of SE in Juneau. Renee and Linda made her very proud to know that they were doing well in school and excelled in their activities. Debra and her son Wesley had a close bond, and would frequently have special times of prayer together. She had a gentle spirit and was a blessing to her family. She had a big smile and a tender heart, and showed special care for her children. At Christmas, she made sure to get a gift for all her nephews and nieces. She loved baking pies for family dinners on special occasions

Debra loved being out in the country, fishing, setting the net with her sister Ommie, and gathering food. She would always store her food properly and with care. During the winter, she would enjoy inviting her family and friends over for delicious meals. She loved going out boating and riding her snowmachine.

Debra had a very strong alto voice and held a special place in the Northern Lights Choir for the Koyuk Covenant Church. She had a big heart and would help her friends and family whenever she could. She was always thankful for whoever helped her.

She had many, many friends from all over Alaska and throughout the lower 48. She enjoyed telling stories about her adventurous trips egg hunting with brother Dean or going boating with her handy lady Margaret Brown. Debra's laugh was contagious and her smile lit many rooms. She would make us laugh until we cried. She will surely be missed by all her close family and friends.
